In all businesses the tendency is more and more to discount years. Probably in the latter case, the explanation is either that the younger man can afford to work for less money than one who has already learned the ways of business, or else that, being young, he has a larger stock of ambition and energy than the man who has toiled from youth until gray hairs. The fire of youth is more attractive than the embers of middle age.

A hard-headed, shrewd and pushing man of business was one day heard to exclaim, "What has sentiment to do with finance? Sentiment and business should be divorced." Business cannot be conducted successfully on eleemosynary principles; but it can and should be altruistic to a certain extent. To ordain that a hard and fast rule as to age must apply to every one, is short-sighted and unjust.

A Presbyterian Protest

LIBERAL thought and the "higher criticism" stirred up the New York Presbytery a few days ago, during a discussion as to the licensing of three young candidates for the ministry. One of these frankly avowed himself unable to assent to the full acceptance of the Holy Scriptures and to certain points in the confession of faith. After a stormy debate, the candidate was accepted by a vote of ten to seven. The Divinity and the Atonement were not involved.

This is the first occasion when the Presbytery has divided on a question of this character, and it is significant of the steady growth of so-called liberal theology in our colleges and seminaries. Some of the conservatives at the meeting declared that to ordain candidates who did not assent to all the doctrine of the Presbyterian Church was "to drive in the entering wedge that would cause the disintegration of Presbyterianism." That this view of the case has strong support is evident from the fact that five conservatives have united in a protest, which will be carried up to the Synod, as the higher ecclesiastical court, where a strong effort will be made to have the whole matter fully reviewed.

It is extremely doubtful, however, whether anything can be gained by such a re-trial. If the stream of advanced theology is to be arrested at all, it must be dealt with at its sources—in the Divinity schools.

The Women's Battle

ALL life and literature are full of the praise of womanhood. It is, says the poet, the woman-soul which ever beckons us upward. Every man sings the praise of a good mother. The noble sister, the devoted, self-sacrificing wife or daughter—what man who reads these lines but has felt their uplifting force? That there are some bad ones, no one denies; but the vast majority are good, and the precious fabrics of the home and the church rest chiefly to-day upon the hearts and the shoulders of our women.

We have recognized this colossal fact by giving to our girls as good educational facilities as we have given to our boys; and they are improving their advantages with a zest such as the world has never seen before. They are crowding our colleges, our schools for manual training, and our art conservatories. They have almost monopolized the field of teaching, of stenography, of salesmanship. Their beautiful pictures and their finished literary work lie side by side with those of their brothers. And yet in the field of law-making, where the statutes are formed regulating the taxes which these women should pay; the sort of schools which their children shall attend; the streets through which they pass; the circumstances under which tobacco and liquors may be sold to their children; the hours of labor; the property rights of their children and themselves; the constitution of the courts and juries which try them and their children; the provisions governing evil resorts, evil pictures, evil literature; all of which have a vital bearing upon the home and the church—in all of these women have no voice.

The keepers of saloons, gambling houses and evil resorts of all kinds, are a unit against woman suffrage. They are willing to spend unlimited sums to defeat it. The evil forces of society are almost unanimously against it. With them are banded many excellent people, who, we are persuaded, have never rightly comprehended the significance and the bearings of the matter. Many are simply indifferent.

Our good people should awake out of their sleep and join forces to help on this great movement in the interest of morality and decent government.

Women as Chinese Teachers

THERE are indications of a reaction in public sentiment on the question of the teaching of Chinese in our Sunday Schools and missions. Immediately after the Sigel tragedy, a loud outcry arose against the employment of white women in any capacity connected with the teaching of Chinamen. It has now become apparent that this clamor was based largely on a misapprehension. For several years the "single scholar" system has been practically non-existent, having been discontinued in nearly all of the schools and missions in New York and vicinity at least. Pastors, teachers and superintendents of Sunday Schools, and mission managers, however, have apparently concluded that their attitude on this question should be set clearly before the public. It is their view that the work of teaching Chinese should hereafter be performed in regular classes, the workers preferably being men, or, when men are not available, then mature women, but never inexperienced young girls. We believe this method would meet all needs, and would be warmly approved by all who are interested in Chinese evangelization in the United States.

Civic Morals

IN New York, a year ago, when the Anti-Race-Track Gambling crusade had been carried through successfully, all the worst elements in the community made common cause against the Governor, who had been a leader in the movement for public morality and who was a candidate for re-election. They threatened to bury him out of sight; but those citizens who esteem honesty and principle in a public official asserted their power and won the day for public morality. General Bingham, New York's chief of police, has a clean record and made a capable officer. Under him, the metropolitan police reached its highest point of efficiency. He was recently removed from office because he would not conduct his department in accordance with the wishes of the political bosses, and declined to fill it with appointees of their choosing. There now seems to be a disposition on the part of the decent citizens of New York to vindicate General Bingham's integrity by making him Mayor. Of course, no effort will be spared by the politicians to beat him, should he be nominated; but the people of Manhattan, once thoroughly aroused against boss domination, have a habit of asserting themselves in a way that leaves deep ruts all along the face of any political machine that may stand in their path. At all events, the bosses seem likely to have an opportunity of doing to Bingham what they tried to do to Governor Hughes—but signally failed.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

German Chancellor at Bay

THERE is scarcely a nation on the earth that is not perplexed with its varied financial problems, and wrestling with the difficulties of raising the funds necessary to conduct the various departments of state. The amount voted by parliaments for the maintenance and increase of armies and navies is so great that there is well-nigh universal revolt against the burdens that oppress the peoples. Prince Bulow is having great difficulty in finding the $125,000,000 which has been added to the budget through Germany's ambitious naval programme. Recently, he faced a full house in the Reichstag and made a statement on the complex financial situation for a trying half hour, but it had little effect upon the members who listened to it. The situation is that the Chancellor is pledged not to accept any reform that does not include an extension of death duties, while the Centre-Conservative coalition opposes additional death duties and suggests new taxes on trade and industry, which the Federal governments decline to impose. The new coalition has shown its strength by rejecting the new government inheritance tax in committee and in securing a majority in the Reichstag on the Centre-Conservative tax on securities. The agrarian or landed agricultural party is at variance with the industrial and commercial class. Prince Bulow made a most eloquent appeal to the patriotism of the nation in his address before the Reichstag. But disappointments have led him to declare his intention of surrendering the chancellorship.

Germany is a great nation. Her soldiers have been her pride and protection, but the war spirit is a grave menace to the country's future. Her enforced military service has driven hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of emigrants to our land; and the ambition of the Emperor and his advisers to greatly increase the naval strength is viewed as a mistake and a peril. It is certain that the common people of Germany, of England, and of other nations are very sore and surly at being taxed so oppressively to feed royal ambitions and costly vanities.

The tendency of the times is to peace and not to war. President Taft and the Ambassadors of France, England and Japan, the other day, committed their respective countries to policies of peace under the shadow of the old fortress at Ticonderoga. Christian civilized nations should set themselves to the reduction rather than the increase of armaments, and thus aid in ushering in that era which Christ foretold and for which he laid down his life.

I will hear what God the Lord will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, (Psa. 85: 8.)

A Husband's Heroism

The wife of Henry Reichert lay dangerously ill in one of the hospitals of New York. The doctors decided that the transfusion of blood was the only possible hope for her cure. Her husband instantly offered the blood in his own veins to save the life of his dear one, but the sacrifice was in vain. At the inquest over the body of his dead wife, he told the coroner, in the simplest manner, how he had fought for the life of the mother of his nine children unto the end. "The doctors told me at the hospital that she had internal hemorrhages and would die unless they could find some one who would give up a lot of blood for her. 'Why, I'm the one to give up the blood,' I told them. 'I'm her husband, ain't I?' They wanted to give me ether, but I wouldn't stand for it. They opened my wrist and tied it to hers, so I could see and feel my blood going away to her—two quarts. I didn't mind. I thought about the kids, and how she'd borne them. I fainted a couple of times. It didn't matter, because I thought I'd save her. But I didn't. I lost twenty pounds from the blood operation, but I'm still able to work nights at my waiter job—for the kids."

Can anything be more beautiful than the story of the loyalty and chivalry of this humble waiter, poor in this world's goods, but rich in love? This man's conduct is only a sample of the heroism of thousands of people in the humbler walks of life whose sympathies and sacrifices are like the wild flowers, unseen by many eyes, but exquisite in their beauty and delicious in their fragrance. We are prepared to believe that Reichert's devotion to his wife, who bore him his children, has its counterpart in the average home of the common people of our country.

Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it. (Eph. 5: 25)

Danger of Inherited Wealth

William Loeffler, a wealthy man of Chicago, died the other day and it is reported among his relatives that the will which he made bequeathed his entire fortune, amounting to a million dollars, to his grandson, Leonard, who is a boy six years old, and the son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Loeffler. The boy's mother professes to be disappointed at the prospect of such a legacy. "I do not want any son of mine to inherit a million dollars," she declared, "because I do not think it does a child any good to have riches which he has not earned. If Leonard can get a fortune by working for it, the way his grandfather had to do, I shall be the proudest mother in the world. I do not want him to get a million dollars for nothing. It spoils children and removes the incentive for work, and it is work that shapes a career."

While it is a laudable ambition for a man to make a reasonable provision for a rainy day for himself and family, the danger of inherited wealth, which Mrs. Loeffler feared, is a real one. As far as temporal success is concerned in this country, a young man who starts out in life with ten cents, eight times out of ten will outstrip the one who begins life with a hundred thousand or a million dollars. Besides, a large fortune is liable to breed vice as well as indolence in the heart of the young man to whom it is left. There are so many indolent, degenerate and wrecked sons of wealth that those who inherit fortunes and live lives of industry and virtue deserve especial commendation. It would be well for the temporal prosperity as well as for the moral character of the young men of our land, if mothers generally were to guard against the danger which Mrs. Loeffler feared.

The hand of the diligent maketh rich, (Prov. 10: 4.)

Chancellor Von Bülow Making His Famous Speech Before the Reichstag

Automobilist Convicted of Manslaughter

The secular and religious newspapers have been constant and vigorous in their denunciations of the reckless driving of automobiles and of the fatal results that have followed. The streets of almost every city of the Union are literally stained with blood, much of it that of innocent children. It is likely that a check will be given to this murderous speeding by the verdict reached, finding William Darragh guilty of manslaughter in the first degree for the killing of Ingvaard Trimble while driving an automobile at high speed in Morningside Avenue, New York City. Driving his car in the streets at forty-five miles an hour, he killed the boy and he did not stop, but tried to make his escape. This verdict of imprisonment for a maximum term of twenty years may doubtless seem to some to be very severe, but most people consider it exceedingly just and necessary at this time. The automobile people themselves approved the decision of the court. Ex-Judge Charles S. Whitman, general counsel for the National Highways Protective Society, organized a few months ago to fight against "joy riding," said he was convinced that the verdict would put a stop to much heedless driving. W. E. Scarritt, one of the governors of the Automobile Club of America and chairman of the Committee on Public Safety of the club, said that a few more such examples should be made. He said that for years his club had been fighting against such reckless driving. With the greatest of prudence, there are necessarily perils in driving automobiles through the streets of the cities. He who, through carelessness or recklessness, crazed by drink or the racing passion, kills another person, should be convicted of manslaughter and put behind the bars, where he will be prevented from repeating his bloody deed.

And for murder was cast into prison. (Luke 23: 19.)

Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Library

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, ex-president of Harvard, promised to name books that could be contained in a three-foot shelf library, whose careful reading for fifteen minutes a day would result in a good general education. He added two feet more to the shelf room and named the books, as follows:

Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin; Journal of John Woolman; Fruits of Solitude, by William Penn; Bacon's Essays and New Atlantis; Milton's Areopagitica and Tractate on Education; Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici; Plato's Apology, Phaedo, and Crito; Golden Sprays of Epictetus; Meditations of Marcus Aurelius; Emerson's Essays; Emerson's English Traits; the complete Poems of Milton; Jonson's Volpone; Beaumont and Fletcher's The Maid's Tragedy; Webster's Duchess of Malfi; Middleton's The Changeling; Dryden's All for Love; Shelley's Cenci; Browning's Blot on the 'Scutcheon; Tennyson's Becket; Goethe's Faust; Marlowe's Dr. Faustus; Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations; Letters of Cicero and Pliny; Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; Burns' Tam o' Shanter; Walton's Compleat Angler and Lives of Donne and Herbert; Autobiography of St. Augustine; Plutarch's Lives; Dryden's Aeneid; Canterbury Tales; Imitation of Christ, by Thomas a Kempis; Dante's Divine Comedy; Darwin's Origin of Species; Arabian Nights.

It is said that some other books are included in the list. They are well suited to such a small library, but Dr. Eliot has thus far omitted two books that ought, in our opinion, to have been named also. The Bible should have been mentioned first, and Shakespeare should have appeared early in the list. We cannot understand how a man of Dr. Eliot's pre-eminent ability and superb character could have omitted the Bible. Professor Huxley, who invented the word "agnostic," and claimed to be one all his life, put so high an estimate on the Bible as a means of education for the young that he appeared before the school board of London and pleaded for its use in the public schools. Among other things, he said: "By the study of what other book could children be so humanized, and made to feel that each figure in that vast historical procession fills, like themselves, but a momentary space in the interval between two eternities, and earns the blessing or the curse of all time according to its effort to do good and hate evil, even as they also are earning their payment for their work?" As a human production, it is the greatest book in the world; and, with its divine authority, it becomes supreme in the educational, moral and spiritual development of the race.

Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. (John 5: 39.)

The Board Walk in the Morning Hours

The Great Auditorium at the Grove

ONCE again the season is here when the great congregations assemble at the famous old camp meeting ground at Ocean Grove, N. J. On Sunday, June 27, the Rev. Bishop Luther B. Wilson preached the opening sermon at the Grove. Cooling breezes swept through the great auditorium and an audience of four thousand greeted the Bishop, whose theme was "Incompleteness." He took his text from Phil. 3:13, 14.

Bishop Wilson

He spoke of professing Christians who have not put away childish things from them. During his discourse he made a tender allusion to Alfred Cookman, one of the founders of Ocean Grove. "What is the meaning of Ocean Grove?" he asked. "Is it not Finding the Master? Is not the work here finding the man, and he finding his incompleteness?"

> Life is only bright when it proceedeth
> Towards a truer, deeper life above;
> Human love is sweetest where it leadeth
> To a more Divine and perfect love.

In the evening of the opening Sunday a large platform meeting was held, Bishop Wilson presiding. Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard, president of the Ocean Grove Association and one of the two surviving founders (the other being the Rev. John H. Alday, leader of the holiness meeting), made the first address. He said: "We must have an outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the people, if this season is to be a success. Holiness must be the standard."

Rev. Mr. Owens, of St. Paul's, Ocean Grove; Rev. Dr. Wheeler and Rev. Dr. Warren, the "hotel chaplain," followed. Bishop Wilson spoke of the great awakening in Wales, where the lack of conventionality in the meetings was a mark of success.

The wonderful growth of Ocean Grove in material things has made of it a great summer city. The spiritual life has grown with the material. The eloquence and spiritual power of its speakers, the high standards in music and the artistic status of the performers are used to promote the uplifting of the people and prove an inspiration to all.

Professor Tali Esen Morgan, director of music at the Grove, has invited Mr. William C. MacFarlane, of St. Thomas' Church, New York, to be the official organist. Every afternoon except Sundays he gives a recital at four o'clock, on the great organ—the largest in the world. This follows a custom adopted long ago in some of the older cities of Europe, and it is becoming a very popular feature at Ocean Grove. Mr. MacFarlane is president of the National Association of Organists, and Professor Morgan honorary president. A cantata written by Mr. MacFarlane, and entitled "The Message from the Cross," will be rendered by him, and the oratorios of "Elijah," by Mendelssohn, and "Eli," by Costa, will also be given. The National Association of Organists will hold their convention at the Grove from August 2 to 13. Among the distinguished artists for the summer will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Louise Homer, Mme. Jeanne Gomeli, Mme. Ellen Beach Yaw, David Bispham, and possibly Mme. Nordica. There will be a festival chorus of 500 voices and a chorus of 1,000 children, and the Marine Band, of Washington, will also be a feature of the music this season.

The Young People's meetings are in charge of Rev. Charles E. Mead, D.D., of New Jersey, assisted by Rev. Dr. Baker. The first meeting was held on June 28, and these gatherings will continue through July and August. In the latter month Rev. W. H. Morgan, D.D., of Newark, N J., will have charge.

The Sunday School, in the Temple, has Mr. Hudson for superintendent, with Mrs. W. H. Skirm in the primary department. Rev. J. H. Alday, D.D., and Dr. Ballard have charge of the holiness meeting. The Bible Class, in the Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, is to be confined strictly to Bible subjects and all irrelevant questions will be eliminated. Dr. Charles E. Roads, who will teach this class, is a well known Bible scholar.

"Elim," the preachers' rest, is a hallowed spot, and is under the management of Mrs. Rives as matron. Morning and evening devotions are led by different ministers staying there. Rev. Dr. J. E. Docking, president of Cookman Institute, Jacksonville, Fla., is among the number.

The programme for Ocean Grove for the remainder of the summer is as follows: July 20 and 21, W. C. T. U. Convention. July 22, Educational Day. July 24, grand concert, Mme, Louise Homer. July 25, Children's Sunday, 10:30 A.M. and 7:30 P.M. July 26, Marine Band. July 27, Sunshine Social concert. July 28 and 29, Woman's Home Missionary Convention. July 31, grand concert.

August 1, Dr. R. B. Forbes preaches, 7:30 P.M. August 2, National Organists' Convention, ten days. August 3, song recital, David Bispham. August 7, oratorio of "Elijah." Sunday, August 8, Rev. Dr. Lewis, 10:30 A.M.; Rev. Dr. Cooke, 7:30 P.M. August 12, Mme. Schumann-Heink. August 13, close of Organists' Convention. August 14, children's concert. August 15, Rev. Cortland Myers, D.D., 10:30 A.M. and 7:30 P.M. August 16, Rev. Cortland Myers, D.D. August 21, oratorio, "Eli." Sunday, August 22, Rev. W. R. Wedderspoon, D.D., 10:30 A.M. and 7:30 P.M. August 23, children's carnival. August 24, children's carnival, college night. August 25, children's carnival, fairy-land festival. August 26, sacred concert. August 27, opening of camp meeting. August 29, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, 10:30 A.M.; Rev. Dr. Cooke, 7:30 P.M. August 30 to September 4, camp meeting.

September 5, Bishop Goodsell, 10:30 A.M.; Dr. Temple, 7:30 P.M. September 6, close of camp meeting; final grand concert. September 12, M. E. Brotherhood; Bishop J. B. Neeley, 10:30 A.M.; Rev. Edgar Blake, D.D., 7:30 P.M. September 26, the closing service.

Without a doubt the present season will prove one of the best ever known at Ocean Grove. The religious and moral surroundings, including the musical advantages, make this place indeed "a garden of the Lord's own planting and watering," and many will receive a new inspiration for work in the Master's great world.

MARY BARTON COOKMAN.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—DISTRICT ATTORNEY JEROME, of New York City, has written to Rev. Dr. J. A. Patterson, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, with reference to the investigation by his department of the charges recently made against the League by Charles R. Mabee, of Detroit, Mich., alleging misuse of the League's funds. An opportunity was afforded to the accuser to substantiate his charges by witnesses, but he failed to do so. Mr. Jerome then directed one of his assistants to investigate the financial affairs of the League, and the books and accounts were found to be properly kept. The district attorney concludes his letter with the words: "I find that the charges are entirely without foundation."

—M. A. W. BAKER, of the South Africa Compounds and Interior Mission, writes that the mission is now spreading the Gospel among the representatives of twenty-five distinct tribes. Not long ago he visited one district only of Portuguese Gazaland, "where I found some thirty or more centres of evangelization, with churches and schools, and baptized one hundred and sixty-four converts."

—A REVIVAL is reported in the province of Shensi, China. Mr. Lutely and a native evangelist have conducted meetings in five different centres. At Shing-Ping many natives confessed their sins. At Sian, between four and five hundred attended the meetings, and at times the whole congregation were on their knees, crying for mercy. At one meeting a Confucianist confessed his sins and asked forgiveness. Many others followed, and all seemed to find peace.

Extremity and Opportunity*

"I DO not think we ourselves are aware," says Henry Drummond, how much our religious life is made up of phrases, with almost nothing behind them of what we really feel and know."

He is speaking on the subject of "Rest." He had just heard a sermon upon it from a distinguished preacher. When he reached home he asked himself, "How did he say I could get rest?" But there was no answer. The preacher had doubtless meant to be practical, yet he had really imparted no information on the most important question which his talk must raise.

Then Mr. Drummond reflected upon the words most employed by us Christians—Rest, Joy, Peace, Faith, Love, Light—and remarks that "an observer might think they formed the staple of Christian experience; but on coming to close quarters with the actual life of most of us, how surely would he be disenchanted."

This is true. We deal too much in mere words; but Jesus set us no such example. He spoke much and eloquently. His discourses have virtually formed the basis of all of the noblest oratory since his day; but his word was ever and always reinforced by the quick, efficient deed.

He is asked where he dwells. He answers at once, "Come and see." No long explanation—the swift, practical, hospitable demonstration.

He chooses Nathanael for his disciple, but Nathanael does not believe. Instantly Christ performs a miracle and wins the man's confidence.

His constantly preached gospel of helpfulness is exemplified at the Cana marriage. His admonitions to unselfishness are enforced with a whip of small cords in the temple at Jerusalem. He preaches to Nicodemus the strong doctrine of the second birth, in which "the deed" is described as the crowning characteristic of the Christian life; upon the evil or the goodness of which God judges men. He talks with a Samaritan woman, thus violating the social precedents of his people, and demonstrating his glorious new doctrine of democracy.

Now he comes to Jerusalem and heals the impotent man—no hurrying to get ahead of the rest of the afflicted crowd that trust in the virtue of the famous pool—no dipping in its troubled waters. Just a word—not even a touch—and healing has come to a man who for nearly forty years has been a burden to himself and all his family. As so many times in every life, the darkest hour came just before the dawn—a fresh lesson in faith and hope for us all. Thousands of God's saints can testify that after they had clung to duty in the face of hard trial, until it seemed as though they must drop away, the relief came, and better than they had ever dreamed. Upon the very heel of disaster, given to toughen and strengthen us, God often chooses to grant some long-desired victory.

A great and beautiful lesson of this miracle, as of others, is the joy and benefit of the Deed.

In a great sermon of Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, upon "The Growing Soul," he says: "One dimension of human greatness will always be lacking to the man or the woman who is not doing something in life with the full consciousness of working as God's vicegerent." And of these deeds he adds that they should have the great object of human advancement. "Every solid service you do should be felt by you as a part of the platform that is permanently to sustain the achievements of centuries to come—a part of world history."

* Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, August 1. TEXT: John 5 : 1-16.

Life Lessons from Acts*

THE stirring and exciting events recorded in the book of Acts form a narrative unsurpassed in consecutive interest by any other in sacred literature. It is as though, the four Gospels having been delivered as a sermon to a great congregation—a sermon closing with the injunction to go forth and impart to the world what they had heard—they were now rising and hurrying to fulfil the command.

Luke begins with almost this very statement. "I have told you of the life and teachings of Jesus," he says, "up to the time when he ascended into the heavens." This was just after he had appeared to his chosen apostles and had promised them the power of the Holy Ghost. His last words to them were, "Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

First, they must ordain a "minister and apostle," to take the place of the false Judas, now dead. After much prayer, the lot fell upon Matthias. Then they were ready to enter actively upon the great work.

It can easily be imagined that they were bewildered and uncertain regarding their future programme. He upon whom they had depended for guidance had vanished out of their sight. They were to go forth and preach his Gospel—but how, where? Gathered "with one accord in one place," they talked together and strove for system and for direction.

As ever with the earnest inquirer, they were not long left in suspense. A rushing mighty wind filled the place, and they were all inspired by the Holy Ghost to speak with tongues.

Then comes to the fore that wonderful apostle Peter, and addresses the great multitude which the news of this miraculous descent had gathered. In a torrent of eloquence he explains the signs and wonders which they had all witnessed. With strong words, apparently drawn without effort from his richly stored memory, he reminds his hearers of unfulfilled ancient prophecies, just as, in his Epistles, he constantly quotes from the Old Testament Scriptures. There is nothing more telling than a truly appropriate illustration from the Bible. We cannot know it too well. Let us store our minds with its treasures, as did Peter.

Then began the great career of Peter and John as healers and preachers, with the inevitable result of opposition and persecution. Unlearned and ignorant though they were, the Spirit gave them such power that the multitude marveled, "perceiving that they had been with Jesus." Thus we also, no matter how deficient we may think ourselves, may overcome the world and gain followers for our Lord.

Then we learn God's implacable hatred of a lie, whether it is merely implied or spoken outright. We see how the Lord can deliver them who are imprisoned for his name's sake. We get models of wonderful sermons.

Then comes the inauguration of the great principle of committee service: Appoint responsible committees for the transaction of all special business.

The martyr spirit is exemplified in the thrilling death of Stephen. We learn from it the forgiving temper with which to meet the onslaughts of the wicked.

But the main burden of this great book, no doubt, after that of showing God's guidance to the apostles in diffusing his religion, and in proving to the world his endorsement of their ministry, is that of the universality of the Gospel. The Gentile, the Jew—all are entitled to its benefits. It supplies the need of every human being.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, August 1. TEXT: Acts 27 : 18-44.

The hotter the day and the dustier the course, the more you appreciate a shower bath, after the game is over.

It takes only a few minutes. And all you need is: A cake of Ivory Soap, a plentiful supply of hot and cold water and a coarse towel.

Cover yourself from head to heels with the Ivory Soap lather. Then, turn the taps and let the water descend on you in refreshing showers.

There! Look at yourself! You are a new man! Your eyes sparkle. Every nerve in your body tingles and your skin is as smooth as satin.

Ivory Soap is in use in the bath and toilet rooms of the majority of golf clubs.

It ought to be in all of them. It would be if golfers who appreciate the importance of pure soap would insist on it.

Ivory Soap . . . . . It Floats.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Gipsies have been encamped near the Pennsylvania village of Gaylordville. The villagers have compelled them to move on. One sick woman has been left behind until she becomes stronger. Her little girl, Flossie, has been taken along with the gipsies, but her ten-year-old son, Marco Bonelli, hides in a cave. After the camp has been deserted, he appears to his mother and vows not to leave her until she is well. He plays the violin in the village streets to support her. The village boys torment him, and the Widow Martin comes to his rescue. The mother dies in a few weeks and he goes to live with the Widow Martin. He tries to earn by his violin enough to pay board and save a fund to find his little sister. He fails in this, and gets a position in a coal mine as a breaker-boy. Marco is taken ill and cannot work. His savings are stolen. He takes his violin and joins an organ-grinder on the road. They come to the gipsy camp. He meets his old friend Jake. Jake informs him that Flossie has gone to New York. Marco returns to the organ-grinder, who had said he was going there. He becomes a member of the organ-grinder's family, and the niece Annetta goes out to sing while Marco plays. The inspector obliges both to go to school. Marco does not like school and life at the home of the organ-grinder becomes more and more unbearable. The man grows ugly and the food scarce. Marco runs away and plays for a living but makes little. Christmas Eve Marco begins to sell papers. A small hunchback named Jimmy objects to Marco selling on a corner he calls his own. He rescues Jimmy from under a moving car, takes him home, and remains with him. Both go to Mont-Lawn. A great man talks there one day and tells the children to be red, white and blue like the flag—red for valor; white for purity; blue for justice. Marco resolves to be "red, white and blue," like the flag. An Italian working at Mont-Lawn, he finds to be his long-lost father, who takes him to his wretched home in New York, and tells him that his name is not Bonelli, but Covino. Marco's father works steadily at first, but soon takes to drink. He makes Marco play for money and stops working. Up near Central Park lives a rich young artist named Howard Preston. He joins the "Big Brother" movement and is told by his pastor that a boy named Covino needs his help. His mother is much surprised. Her little daughter is curious concerning the "Big Brother" relationship. Preston goes to look up his charge. He finds Covino suspicious and ready to fight against his entrance to the squalid room. Preston is somewhat dismayed, but disarms him by his good nature.

PRESTON drew a long breath. He hoped his face did not show how great was his satisfaction.

"Well, my name is Howard Preston, and I came—but suppose you tell me first what it is that you've got against the police and the Settlement people. It might be safer—for me, you know," he finished with an expressive smile.

To his joy the smile was answered, slowly, but unmistakably, in the gleam of appreciation that relaxed the boy's face. Indeed, so elated was the man that he plunged on recklessly.

"The police, now; what have they done?" he questioned. He saw his mistake at once in the quick hardening of the sensitive mouth opposite, and in the angry flash that leaped to the dark eyes. "Or the Settlement people," he added, in hurried conciliation. "Suppose we begin with them. What have they done?"

"Nothin'."

"Oh, I thought they had. You seem not to like their—company."

"Well, they wanted me ter leave—dad."

"They did?" Preston's voice expressed polite surprise. "Maybe they didn't understand just how the case stood. Anyhow, it wasn't very considerate of them; was it? Of course you wouldn't leave him!"

The boy turned quickly. The room was very quiet. Over in the corner the man still slept, but not so noisily. For a moment the boy gazed straight into his visitor's eyes. Into his own the old distrust had sent a fierce gleam of suspicion.

"Look a-here, quit yer chinnin'," he snapped, at last. "What do ye want, anyhow?"

Preston laughed pleasantly.

"I have been a good while coming to my errand, I'll own," he confessed. "The truth is, I'm painting a picture, and in it I'm putting a boy of just about your size. I need a model—a boy to look at, you know, so I'll be sure to get him in just right. I thought maybe you'd be willing to come and pose for me—that is, just sit still and let me look at you while I paint. What do you say?"

There was no answer. The boy was dumb with sheer amazement.

"Of course you understand that I should pay you for your time," went on Preston, smoothly; "and I'm afraid I should need a good deal of it, too," he added, casually mentioning the sum per hour that his model might expect to receive.

The boy's eyes seemed almost to pop out of his head.

"Ye don't mean that you'll pay me all that ter jest sit still an' be looked at!" he exclaimed.

"Why, of course! You can't be earning anything anywhere else at the time, you know; and if I take you away from your regular employment, I should make good the time lost. Will that be enough to pay you for it, and will you come?"

The boy threw him a glance, half pitying, half scornful.

"Oh, yes; it's enough — an' I'll come."

"Thank you," murmured Preston; and after giving explicit directions as to how, when, and where to go, he smilingly nodded his good-bys.

Once outside the stuffy hallways, he drew a deep breath.

"I think I may say I've cracked the ice—if not broken it," he muttered to himself.

At home he told his mother this much:

"Well, mater, I went, I saw, and I think I conquered—at least to a certain extent. Anyhow, the boy promised to come up here to-morrow."

"Here? Oh, Howard, how could you!—and so soon!"

"Don't worry, dear. It's only business—or so he thinks, I assure you. I'm going to paint him. He'll come to the studio like any other model. I'd keep Florence out of the way, however. I'm not quite ready for her to begin to be a 'sister' to him."

"Out of the way!—I should say so," cried Mrs. Preston.

Her son smiled merrily, as he turned to go upstairs. Ten minutes later he was busy making out the card that must go back to the Executive Secretary—his first report as a Big Brother.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE NEW MODEL

AS THE appointed hour for his new model's appearance drew near, Preston became more and more fearful that the boy would not come, after all. In the calm reasoning that the second day brought, his victory looked unpleasantly like defeat. He could not be at all positive now that that last impish grin was not a sure indication that the whole thing had been to him a huge joke, and that he had agreed to the arrangement merely to rid himself of a troublesome visitor. Great was Preston's sorrow, therefore—but not his surprise—when the boy failed to appear.

Afternoon found Preston once more at the top of the rickety tenement-house stairs. This time he knocked, and spoke just as he gently pushed open the door.

"They said you were up here, so I came right in," he began briskly. "I didn't want to be mistaken for anybody I wasn't this time, you see. Besides, I wanted to make sure I found you. I'm afraid my directions weren't clear somehow yesterday. You didn't come this morning."

"No; I didn't come." The boy was alone in the room, sitting in a chair by the window. He did not even turn his head as he spoke.

"Get lost?"

A fleeting something like derision crossed the boy's face.

"No; I didn't go."

"Oh, come now! You know I engaged you, and—"

"I had another job—dad," interrupted the boy, laconically.

"Oh, I see. Sick?"

"No; drunk."

There was a momentary pause. Preston was uncertain just how to proceed. His eyes were on the defiantly uptilted chin opposite. To his surprise, the boy himself made the next move. Had Preston but known it, the lonely little fellow had reached the point where human sympathy—even though from a stranger—seemed an absolute necessity.

"Ye see, dad was down ter Sullivan's, cuttin' up like time, an' they come for me," he explained with a tremulousness that belied the defiant chin. "There ain't anybody what can do so much with dad as I can, most gen'rally. But even I wa'n't no use this time."

"Why, what happened?"

"He run off—got away. I don't know where he is."

"Oh, he'll come back all right; never fear."

"But he's sick."

"All the more reason why you'll see him, then. He won't stay away long."

The boy turned fiercely.

"Mebbe now you want me ter leave him! eh?"

"By no means," retorted the man, promptly. "But, see here, we are quite forgetting what I came for; and there's my picture waiting for its model — and all because you didn't come this morning."

A faint ray of interest came into the boy's eyes.

"Say, did ye mean it—all that chinnin' about my bein' paid for bein' looked at?"

WANTED: A Name

We are about to publish a volume by one of New York's leading Pastors. The title suggested by the Author is,

THE CLOISTER BOOK For Shut-in Worshippers and Pastorless Congregations.

We want a better title. Suggestions are invited from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A copy of the book will be sent FREE for each of the ten best suggestions. Should one be adopted, the sum of $25.00 will be paid for it.

The book will furnish a Sermon, appropriate Prayers, Scripture Lessons and Hymns to make a complete Order of Service for each Sabbath, for a half-year. The aged, sick and those otherwise disabled, or those far removed from opportunities of worship, will thus be enabled, in their homes, to unite in spirit with those privileged to join in the fellowship of the House of God. The book will be found useful, also, in conducting the worship of Congregations that are without pastors, the Order of Service being so arranged that any church officer or other suitable person can read it. The volume will be set in clear type—12mo. in size, cloth-bound, and will contain about 320 pages. The price will be $1.00 postpaid. Advance orders, received before September 1st, 1909, will be filled at 75c. per copy, postpaid.

"Certainly. I engaged you, too, and ou promised to come. It was a con- ract, though not in writing. I don't elieve, however, that you're the sort f boy that goes back on his word just ecause he hadn't signed his name."

Unconsciously the boy lifted his hin a little. The man saw the move- ent, and smiled.

"Of course, you couldn't come this norning," he went on conciliatingly. 'More important duties detained you. But I fancy you'll be there to-morrow norning all right."

"Sure, I'll be there ter-morrow nornin'," promised the boy, decidedly. And the young artist went home well ontent.

In the studio of the Preston man- ion as the appointed time approached, he arrival of the new model was awaited with much interest. Preston had wanted to stay longer with the boy the day before, but something within him had warned him that Marco would be quick to resent any- hing that savored of intrusion into his own affairs; and the new Big Brother did not wish to jeopardize, by too much haste, the little success that he had already won. Therefore he had steeled himself to come away.

By his orders the boy was shown directly to the studio. He came in with an air of diffidence that was yet half bravado. When Preston caught sight of him, he was mimicking behind his back the pompous footman who had admitted him, and so per- fectly that Preston had difficulty to keep his face, as he advanced with outstretched hand.

"Good morning, Marco. I'm glad to see you're prompt."

"Jiminy, but ain't he a swell!" mur- mured the boy, his eyes following the retreating form of the livery-clad servant. "An' ain't it all swell!" he added, his admiring gaze sweeping the sumptuous room.

"I'm glad you like it," laughed the artist. "You see, if you're to spend so much time here sitting for me, you will want something pleasant to look at; and—" he stopped suddenly. A curi- ous light had come to the boy's face. His eyes were fixed upon an enormous landscape that covered almost half the wall space across the room. As if fascinated, he was creeping with soundless steps nearer and nearer to the painting, his gaze never leaving it. Then instinctively he began to move backward—he had gone too near for the best effect. At just the right point, he stopped, and fell softly to one knee, his hand shading his eyes, as if he were out of doors in the sun- light.

"Why, mister, it's trees an' grass, an' sky," he breathed in an awestruck voice.

"Thank you," murmured the pic- ture's creator.

"An' there's water all shinin' with the sun on it," continued the boy, rap- turously. "Why, mister, it don't seem as if it could be jest—" he stopped, and rose to his feet. With almost reverent hesitation he advanced close to the painting, then turned sharply.

"It is! It ain't only painted!"

"Thank you," murmured the artist again, strangely moved.

The boy had gone back to his old position, his eyes aflame.

"I don't see how ye did it," he mut- tered, as if to himself. "There's the light all misty an' shinin', jest as I've seen it; an' it's goin' ter be all pink an' red, an' gold, an'—an' bang-up, when that sun gits out o' sight. That's the kind what does—I knows 'em!"

"You must be fond of—nature," said Preston, tremulously.

"Hnh?"

"Where did you learn it—this love of—of trees and grass and sky?"

"Learn it? I didn't never learn it. You don't have ter. 'Tain't like 'rithmetic an' g'ography. It jest growed up along with me."

"But where you live—you don't have them there—trees, and grass—"

"I reckon I don't," interrupted the boy, chokingly, "Seems sometimes as if I never did have 'em. But I did! I had 'em when I was little, an' I had 'em last at that 'ere Mont-Lawn up the river. An' 'twas like that, too," he added, turning absorbedly to the picture. "A big wide sky with the water all shinin' out towards the edge. I used ter set an' look at it. 'Twas there, ye know, where I found out about bein' red, white an' blue ter dad."

"You found out about being—wha-at?"

"About bein' red, white an' blue ter dad, ye know," repeated the boy, his dreamy eyes still on the picture.

There was a dazed silence; then dimly the man understood. With a sudden impulse he held out his hand.

"Good for you, Marco!" he cried un- steadily. "And I'm glad to meet a boy who's red, white and blue like that!" To be continued

The Mortgage Has Been Paid

(See illustration on cover page)

'TWAS a long hill and a hard pull,
But the end is on the way.
We've had our cup of trouble full
And night seemed come to stay.
The old house needs a nail or two,
And carpets must be laid;
But those seem little things to do
Since the mortgage has been paid.

Around our necks it hung like lead
For thirty years or more.
You see we both were sick in bed,
And we had bairns galore.
They must be fed, we must have care,
And so the debt was made.
But that's all past—the skies look fair—
For the mortgage has been paid.

The Restoration of the Jews

NOTING the articles and comments concerning the return of the Jews to their ancient home and country, I am minded to suggest that a day of prayer be set apart, both for their re- turn and their conversion, as both ap- pear to be according to the will of God; and if we pray according to his will we may be sure we are right. "Thy kingdom come"—among the Jews as well as the Gentiles, and in all the na- tions and families of the earth.

I thought, when I noted the startling juxtaposition in time between their admission to the temple area, Decem- ber 23, 1908, and the earthquake in southern Italy, December 28, that the end of their afflictions by their great- est enemies was marked, as its begin- ning had been, by an earthquake. The destruction of Pompeii was nine years after that of Jerusalem by Titus, but the ruin of Calabria almost dates the late startling phases in the overthrow of Israel's greatest enemy, save Rome. Then, too, Rome in all its shapes, manifestations, and succes- sions, and Islamism in all its power to desolate have been the mightiest foes of Christianity! Therefore Chris- tians and Jews should now learn to- gether their lesson of unity and faith in one Christ, and march together in triumph over their common enemies—the great incarnations of the spirit of persecution. W. J. PEELE.

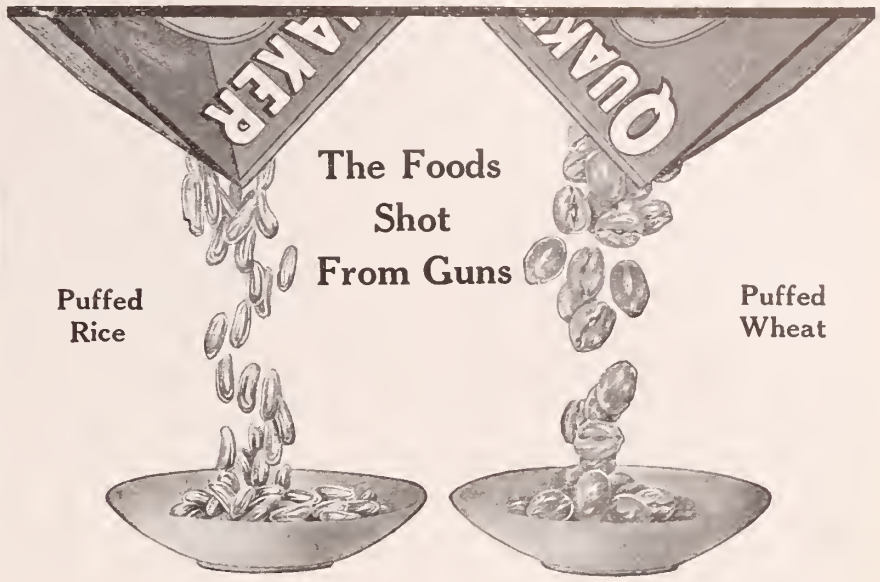
Helping the Five Points Mission

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The "first fruits" of your kindness noticing our work in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a subscription of five dollars, sent me this morning from Mrs. E. A. Freeman, South Framingham, Mass. F. J. BELCHER.



A Million a Month

At this writing the sale on Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice exceeds a million packages monthly.

It has almost doubled in the past three months. Every day, apparently, some ten thousand new homes adopt them.

All over the country, one is telling another about these enticing foods. And the others tell others.

Before the summer is over, perhaps a million new homes will enjoy them. Won't you let your home be one?

Chosen by Three in Four

At our New York lunch room we serve ten kinds of cereals—all our own make—to hundreds of people daily.

We serve all without preference, and all at one price—15 cents per dish. For our object is to learn what people want.

Of each 1,000 people who take ready-cooked cereals, 747 take the foods shot from guns.

Only one-fifth as many take Corn Flakes, one-tenth as many take Wheat Flakes, one-eighth as many take Breakfast Biscuits.

Our patrons are mainly men—men who want foods that are real and sub- stantial. These are the foods they choose.

That indicates clearly that three homes in four will want puffed foods when they know them.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c

Except in the Extreme West

These are the foods invented by Prof. Anderson, and this is the curious process:

The whole wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved, for sixty minutes, in a heat of 550 degrees.

That fierce heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous. Then the guns are unsealed. Instantly every starch granule is exploded into a myriad particles, so the digestive juices act promptly.

The kernels of grain are expanded eight times—made four times as porous as bread. Yet the coats are unbroken, the shapes are unaltered. We have giant grains, crisp and delicious, ready to melt in the mouth.

The Children's Choice

If we had a lunch room where children were served, it is probable that nothing but these puffed foods would sell.

For the great crisp grains, to the children's taste, are the most delicious foods in existence.

Prove this on your table—hear what your people say. Serve Puffed Wheat one morning and Puffed Rice the next.

One of these foods will be your breakfast forever, if you let your people choose.

Try it tomorrow—order a package now.

THE JOY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WHEN the apostle Paul left Athens and came to Corinth, he made a journey of about fifty miles. Corinth was as renowned a city as Athens, but in a very different way. It was a proud distinction to be called an Athenian, for it was supposed that one bearing such a title must either be a philosopher, an orator, a sculptor, or somebody of consequence. But to be called a Corinthian threw a suspicion upon one's moral character, for we are told that Corinth was "a colony without aristocracy, without tradition, without well established citizens; a population of Greek adventurers and Roman bourgeois, with a tainting infusion of Phœnicians—a mass of Jews, ex-soldiers, philosophers, merchants, sailors, freedmen, slaves, tradespeople, hucksters, and agents of every form of vice; its very name had become a synonym for reckless debauchery."

It would seem that such a soil would be more hopeless for the growth of Gospel seed than Athens. But we will see whether it was or not.

Paul Making Tents in the House of Aquila

How Paul Found Friends

He sought his own kind, and found Aquila, a Jew, and his wife Priscilla. They were refugees from Italy, Claudius, the Emperor, having expelled all Jews from Rome.

Another point of contact between Paul and his new-found friends was that all three were tent-makers. Let us not marvel that so great a scholar as Paul was also a workingman. It is said that all rabbinical authorities in Christ's time, and later, worked at some trade. Gamaliel, Paul's teacher, was a wood-cutter, and his rival, Shammai, was a carpenter. Yes, and Jesus himself was a carpenter!

The Lord of love came from above
To live with the men who work.

Altogether Paul probably remained in Corinth a year and six months. It was not long before he was joined by Silas, coming from Berea, and by Timothy, coming from Thessalonica; possibly by Luke also.

The doing of two kinds of work—God's work for souls, and man's work for his daily bread—suggests a railroad track with the two rails running parallel. And we may think of men as a train moving in steady motion along the two tracks. Paul's toil at tent-making did not hinder him as a Gospel preacher, while his mission as a preacher was only furthered by the opportunity which the work afforded him to come in close contact with men. In every Christian life this railroad track of work should be formed.

Work is a joy to those who are true-hearted. If a railroad train had feelings we might easily imagine that it felt pleasure in speeding along the track, and in the end arriving at its destination. To the human heart there is the joy of achievement. The joy of reward for work is a secondary feeling. The cheerful, ceaseless clatter of the train suggests cheerfulness in our work. George Macdonald says: "The smile is the flame of the sacrifice of service and makes it holy." Mr. D. L. Moody, in describing the work of his "Yoke-fellows' Band," in which a young convert and an experienced Christian were set to work together, used to delight in telling about a young Swede, who, not understanding English, stood at the corner of the street and gave out printed invitations to the passers-by to attend the evening services in the mission. Mr. Moody said he had a happy smile, and showed a white and beautiful set of teeth. If they thanked him, he smiled; if they cursed him, it was all the same, he smiled. He did not understand, and the people thought they never knew such a good-natured fellow and felt all the more inclined to accept the invitation to attend the church services. They were really smiled into the church.

The ability to smile when one is at work depends upon the condition of body one is in. In a certain mill the number of working hours was decreased, which resulted in an increase in the output. Why? Because work with a cheery heart and a fresh brain always pays better than work with an exhausted brain and a worn-out body.

There are some things which make work a weariness to the spirit, if not to the flesh. One of these is the microbe of a desire for change.

"Oh, dear!" said a tired little fellow, weary with his day's play and yet not relishing making ready for a night's rest. "Oh, dear, I wish it was night, and I was undressed and in bed, and it was morning and I was up and dressed again." There was a good deal of human nature in that wish. It is not always that what we are doing or are passing through is in itself distasteful to us; but our desire is to have done with this, in the expectation of something better beyond. During all of that one year and a half that Paul sat with Aquila and Priscilla, and made tents, we are persuaded that he never desired any other kind of occupation. He did not waste his force in wishing for some other kind of work. He put his hands into the tent-making, but he put his soul into God's work.

It must be acknowledged that some people have an actual dislike for work. Ralph Waldo Emerson says: "How many men would fain go to bed dunces

HOME TESTING

A Sure and Easy Test on Coffee.

To decide the all important question of coffee, whether or not it is really the hidden cause of physical ails and approaching fixed disease, one should make a test of 10 days by leaving off coffee entirely and using well-made Postum.

If relief follows you may know to a certainty that coffee has been your vicious enemy. Of course you can take it back to your heart again, if you like to keep sick.

A lady says: "I had suffered with stomach trouble, nervousness and terrible sick headaches ever since I was a little child, for my people were always great coffee drinkers and let us children have all we wanted. I got so I thought I could not live without coffee but I would not acknowledge that it caused my suffering.

"Then I read so many articles about Postum that I decided to give it a fair trial. I had not used it two weeks in place of coffee until I began to feel like a different person. The headaches and nervousness disappeared and whereas I used to be sick two or three days out of a week while drinking coffee, I am now well and strong and sturdy seven days a week, thanks to Postum.

"I had been using Postum three months and had never been sick a day when I thought I would experiment and see if it really was coffee that caused the trouble, so I began to drink coffee again, and inside of a week I had a sick spell. I was so ill I was soon convinced that coffee was the cause of all my misery and I went back to Postum with the result that I was soon well and strong again and determined to stick to Postum and leave coffee alone in the future."

End of Paul's Second Journey

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEREVER Paul preached, the Word of God which he served, nd to which he was a witness, did a ure work. It brought about division etween receivers and rejectors, those ho were saved, and those who per- hed. God led this apostle of the Gen- les to Corinth, one of the centres of he world's commerce. Would that Vord which had proved to be the ower of God to some immortal souls n literary, artistic Athens, be found he same "power of God" among the oney-loving merchants of Corinth? 'aul learned by God's Spirit how in- nitely small was the difference of cir- umstances in which he might be laced, and how infinitely great was he power of God in his Word to over- ome them; he saw circumstances in he light of the Word and not the Word n the light of circumstances.

He found at Corinth, probably in the ynagogue, a certain Jew named quila, born in Pontus, lately come rom Italy with his wife, Priscilla. 'robably Aquila was a Christian Jew, nd Paul, in his labors in Asia, may ave become acquainted with him pre- iously. He took up his abode with hem, and joined in the business by vhich they earned their living.

Paul counted it a privilege to main- ain himself so that he might not be burdensome" to the church. Even vhen he had to break into the hours of he night, he would rather maintain imself than let those to whom he came vith a Gospel without money and vithout price think that he would seek ersonal benefit by preaching the Gos- el. Yet under the discipline of the Holy Ghost, his business was so kept in heck, and so took the second place, hat he only gained enough for his vants; nothing for luxury or self- ndulgence. In the spirit of willing, oyous sacrifice, he worked at his trade with Aquila and Priscilla, and "rea- soned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks." A Christian man of busi- ness, one who, like the Lord Jesus, can be about his Father's business in the carpenter's shop as well as in the midst of the elders in the temple, is an irre- fragable proof that in the midst of the strongest temptations to covetousness, and worldliness, there is power in the Lord Jesus to keep his trusting and consecrated children. Paul lived Christ as well as preached him. Thus his reasoning in the synagogue had facts behind it which proved all he said.

When Silas and Timothy came from Macedonia, the presence of two more men filled with the Spirit was a power to which Paul was very sensitive. Their presence gave an impetus to Paul. Something must happen now; the Synagogue was divided—some opposed and blasphemed. It was a critical moment for Paul. He shook his raiment, turned his back upon the synagogue, and took his few converts, including Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, into the house of Justus, one of his converts, and God gave him fruit; some heard, believed, and were baptized. A breach was made by Paul with the Jews for the first time. In most places they had cast him out, but, on this occasion, he left them, saying, "Your blood be on your own heads, I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles."

Only the distinct guidance of God, which Paul well understood, could have determined the length of his stay in the various places to which God sent him. There was nothing uniform, nothing systematic, and yet, on the other hand, nothing eccentric about his movements. Confident that God had a plan with which all his directions were consistent, the great apostle sim- ply followed and obeyed.

Many young people who fancy prose nd poetry of lasting fame can be pro- luced without days and weeks of ear- nest thought, need to be reminded that Goldsmith considered four lines a day good work, and was seven years beat- ng out the pure gold of The Deserted Village.

With great trouble a small body of nen were busy hoisting a heavy log to he top of the blockhouse that was be- ng repaired, after an assault in one of the campaigns of the War of Amer- can Independence.

As the log swung to and fro, the voice of a little man was heard encour- aging the workers with a "Heave away! There she goes! Heave ho!"

By and by there rode past an officer n plain clothes, who asked the little man why he did not help the others.

"Sir," was the pompous reply, "I am a corporal!"

"Indeed," said the other, "I did not know that; I ask your pardon, Mr. Corporal."

Dismounting without further ado, the officer lent a willing hand till the job was done. Then, wiping the hon- est sweat off his brow, he turned to the little man and remarked:

"The next time, Mr. Corporal, you have a bit of work like that in hand, and too few men to do it, send for the commander-in-chief, and I'll come again and assist you."

With which offer and rebuke, Gen- eral Washington left the astonished corporal to his own reflections.

John Ruskin says: "During such investigation as I have been able to give to the lives of the artists whose works are in all points noblest, no fact ever looms so large upon me, no law re- mains so steadfast in the universality of its application, as the fact and law that they are all great workers; noth- ing concerning them is matter of more astonishment than the quantity they have accomplished in the given length of their life; and when I hear a young man spoken of as giving promise of high genius, the first question I ask about him is always, Does he work?"

"All things come to those who hustle while they wait." This motto was given by Thomas A. Edison, the great inventor, in response to a request made of him that he send a sentiment to go with his portrait in Columbia University, which should be helpful to the students. Mr. Edison wisely re- vised and improved the old adage, "All things come to them who wait." We are not told that Paul hustled in his tent-making, but we feel assured with- in ourselves that he made just as many tents between Sabbaths as it was pos- sible for one man to make.

Undoubtedly Paul's work on tents was an incentive to Aquila and Pris- cilla. They must have made more tents because Paul worked with them, than if they had worked alone, and likewise Paul did more than he would have done alone. There is a precious law of compensation in brotherhood.

WINS HER HEART

Food that Helps Baby and the Family Pleases Mother

Show a mother how to feed her baby so that it will be healthy, rosy and plump, and grow up strong and sturdy, and the mother's gratitude is everlasting.

A mother says: "Five weeks ago I weaned baby, but could not get her to take any kind of food until I tried Grape-Nuts, which she relished from the first, and on it she has plumped up and blossomed into a fat, chubby little girl.

"I feed Grape-Nuts to her regularly—use three packages a week for baby and my three-year-old boy alone, and I find that it regulates and keeps them nourished, strong and in good health all the time.

"Since feeding my children on Grape-Nut I have used absolutely no medicine for either of them. Such food as this, that does such wonders, wins its way to a mother's heart. Please accept our thanks for the good your food has done in our family, where we all eat it."

Children will grow up strong and healthy, or weak and puny, according to the food they get.

Grape-Nuts is a complete and perfect food for adults and children, is made on scientific lines and this is easily proved by trial.

Questions and Answers

Subscriber, Washington, D. C. Please explain Isa. 4:1, 2 and Isa. 19:19, 20.

The prophet is describing in Isaiah, chapter 4, a period of calamity. So many men would be slain that the women would preponderate. "We will eat our own bread" means that they would provide for themselves. "Take away our reproach" referred to the Jewish view which regarded unwedded and childless women as to be pitied. Verse 2 contrasts the happy portion of those who will escape this sad visitation; they are the "escaped of Israel." The passage in chapter 19 shows that Isaiah did not contemplate a temple in Egypt, but merely an altar and a pillar of remembrance, and that they would not trust in idols, but in Jehovah, who would send them a deliverer (interpreted by some commentators to be Alexander the Great).

Jessie B., Danbury, Conn. What martyr was it who answered all the questions of his inquisitors with a single brief reply, always in the same words?

You probably refer to the martyr Lucian, who, to all interrogatories as to his nationality, his occupation, his parentage, etc., responded to each question: "Christianus sum" (I am a Christian).

S. E. T., Denver, Colo. 1. Are the Ten Commandments a part of the Mosaic Law? 2. Is the Fourth Commandment binding to-day? 3. Is it the law of Moses that Christ came to fulfil?

1. The Decalogue, or "Law of the Ten Words"—the first law given through Moses—stands as the ethical code prefixed to the whole body of Sinaitic legislation. It is included with one of the Codes of Hebrew Law, which embraces also the "Book of the Covenant" and the "Little Book of the Covenant." 2. Yes; but it is to be interpreted in the light of Christ's own words. (See Luke 6:1-5; Matt. 12:1-15; Mark 2:23-28; Luke 13:14-17; John 7:23; John 5:18.) The old Jewish interpretation of Sabbath observance imposed many needless restrictions and subordinated the spiritual to the ceremonial. 3. See Matt. 5:17; John 13:34; John 15:12. He came not to destroy, but to fulfil and to release from bondage unto the written law those who believed in him, and to place them under grace. See Gal. 3:23-25; Gal. 5:4; Titus 3:7; John 1:17; Rom. 6:14, 15.

C. P. S., Adrian, Wash. While voting with either of the leading parties that offers the best in legislation is doubtless right, is not bargaining for votes beforehand corruption, pure and simple?

It is not necessarily corruption to pledge one's self beforehand to vote for a good man, or a desirable measure. It is corruption, however, when any consideration, pecuniary or otherwise, is promised in return for such a pledge. There is no harm in expressing one's preference beforehand.

W. C., Route No. 8, Andalusia, Ala. Is the Panama Canal being constructed with locks, or without them? Is the ocean higher on the Atlantic side than on the Pacific? If so, why?

The Panama Canal is to be a lock canal. The average level of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans is the same; the water may be raised temporarily by the wind blowing steadily against our coast. The two oceans are already connected by the open water south of South America, and this would prevent one becoming higher than the other.

Mrs. W. F. R., Columbus, Kan. Please explain 1. John 5:17, 18; I. John 1:3-6, and I. John 1:8, 10.

The apostle was speaking of sins that absolutely lead to perdition (having in mind presumably persistent apostasy). If such a sinner is unrepentant, the apostle, on his own authority, holds that prayers in his behalf would be unavailing, as God compels no one to accept salvation against his will. He then points out that there are other cases, in which the sinner has sinned less heinously, and these are proper subjects for intercession and effort. On the other hand, the regenerated man puts himself constantly under divine protection against sin, which, though it may assail him, is powerless as long as he enjoys that protection and while he consecrates his energies to God's work. The same idea is presented in I. John 3:6. In I. John 1:8-10, the apostle points out that sin is naturally inherent in all, and that all have sinned, but may be cleansed and kept by this divine power.

A. R., Carlton, Ore. How many children are kept at Mont-Lawn?

Three hundred to three hundred and fifty, for a period of ten days. Over three thousand are guests of the Home in the entire season. Send the other question to the War Department, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. C. H. M., Earlehurst, Va. What do you think about our dead friends talking to us through a medium, and raising a brass horn or trumpet in a dark room? Is it right for Christians to patronize such things?

The Society of Psychical Research, which for a number of years has been honestly and thoroughly investigating the whole subject and dealing with the most famous mediums here and abroad, has put itself on record as saying that not in a single instance has it been satisfactorily proved that genuine communications were received from spirits. This is the highest modern authority, and may be accepted as authoritative. Mediums, according to this showing, are clever impostors, and the whole business is one of money-making. We are warned in Scripture against necromancers and diviners and those who seek after familiar spirits.

R. P., Regina, Canada. How large a proportion of the people of Germany are Roman Catholics?

According to the census of 1900 there were in Germany 35,231,104 Protestants, 586,948 Jews and 20,327,913 Roman Catholics. Submit the other question to a local physician.

L. B. P., Madison, Ga. Please explain Rom. 8:29, 30.

The whole subject of predestination is one of age-long controversy. Professor Weiss explains it by saying that the passages quoted refer, not to all, but only to those who love God: "When He formed the purpose of bringing them to redemption, he did not choose them at random or by chance, but those whom he, as the Searcher of hearts, had beforehand known as those in whom his grace could work this love for him." This, according to Olshausen, is "a predestination of saints, in the proper sense of the word." On the other hand, there are those who hold that "an absolute, irreversible decree of this character fails to answer the essential conditions of the divine perfection and the all about us, which he cannot grasp that he hesitates to deny what he simply cannot understand. If God expresses himself so potently and so variously in the natural world, how can we, with the use of natural senses only, reach out and comprehend his ways in the far vaster spiritual world?

M. McR. Please explain Matt. 27:52, 53.

The record is that an earthquake split the rocks, opening the tombs of many saints, who, after the resurrection of Jesus, being quickened into life, appeared to many in Jerusalem. It was a symbol that the seal of the grave had been broken and that Christ's triumph over death had brought resurrection and eternal life to the world, according to his promise. They were trophies of his victory over death, and went to glory with him.

Mrs. L. R. S., Berkeley, Calif. If the treasures of heaven are entirely spiritual, then why do we seek so persistently the high mental culture, and all the refinements of life, in this world? Will not the ignorant but spiritualized man of the hoe enjoy as much of heaven as the man whom fortune has helped to secure the highest mental attainments?

Mental development is not incompatible with spiritual culture. It is our duty to make the best use of our talents or endowments, which are gifts from God and which should be cultivated and devoted to good and noble purposes.

J. A. S., Jonesboro, Tenn. Are the Armenians of the same nationality as the Turks?

No; they were a separate people, conquered by the Turks several centuries ago. They speak a language of the Aryan family, and dress like the Turks, with the exception of the headdress, a fur cap being worn instead of a fez. The other question was answered in full in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

J. J. B., Dayton, O. How can a miracle be proved?

From a material standpoint, it may be unprovable, like many other things. Until one learns to take a step forward in simple faith, no spiritual progress is possible. Can you account for the great movements of human thought which have so influenced the minds of men that they have been led to conclusions which only a few years before would have been regarded as impossible? To your true scientist, there are so many wonders in nature, and

Souvenir Sellers at the Midsummer Fair at Olympia, London

LONDON'S great Midsummer Charity Fete and Fair, held at Olympia, was attended by many Americans who are now sojourning in England. At the different stalls or booths for the sale of souvenirs, there were in attendance as saleswomen many English ladies of title and a number of well-known Americans. Among the latter were Mrs. Drexel, of Philadelphia; Miss Drexel, Miss Anita Stewart, fiancée of Prince Miguel of Braganza, and others. Queen Alexandra took an active part in this beautiful and picturesque charity, which was one of the most popular London has known in years.

Ignorance is not the best soil for spirituality, but rather simplicity and earnestness. Remember the parable of the talents. God takes cognizance of character; but endowment is a spur to character, affording it wider opportunities and a larger field of service for every good work.

T. J. L., Oakmound, Minn. 1. When was the Erie Canal dug? 2. Is it possible for a lawyer to be a Christian, and take all kinds of cases for pay?

The Erie Canal was commenced in 1817 and completed in 1825. It is 365½ miles long, and varies in depth from 7½ to 9½ feet. It is now being enlarged to make it a barge canal. 2. Justice concedes the right of legal defense even to the poorest client or greatest criminal. As long as a lawyer abides by the proper rules of his profession in conducting cases, his own character and conscience need not suffer.

Reader, Meridian, Miss. 1. Is there any mention in the prophecy of Daniel concerning the career of Napoleon? 2. Is there anything in the Bible that says that the Jews will not be permitted to return to Palestine?

1. No. Some students of prophecy, however, have claimed that certain prophecies in Daniel and others in Revelation have pointed to Napoleon. 2. The Jews hold that their race will ultimately be restored to its ancient power and glory, and interpret certain prophecies to that effect. See Zech. 14:9, and other passages. It is not quite clear, however, that it is to be interpreted as meaning that they will be restored to their ancient home. (See also Rom. 11:1:27.)

F. H. Wynantskill, N. Y. Do you believe any one will be damned?

Damnation, or condemnation, does not always imply the final loss of the soul. Thus the passage in Rom. 13:2 clearly means condemnation from the rulers, "who are a terror to evil-doers." I. Cor. 11:29 means that the offender would be exposed to severe temporal judgments from God and to the censure of good men. Rom. 14:23 means that such a one is condemned already by the Word and by his own conscience. The final loss of the soul of the impenitent, however, is clearly taught in many passages, including Rom. 6:23, Matt. 25:41; Jas. 1:15; Matt. 10:28, II. Thes. 1:9, Matt. 25:30, Luke 16:23, 26.

W. H., Jansen, Sask., and others. The system taught in our Shorthand Correspondence Course by mail is Pitman-Graham—the standard in business. The enrolment fee is $2.

W. C. McG., Pekin, Ind. The use of tobacco is a vulgar habit, and may even be called a vice. We cannot see what "binding the conscience" had to do with the case in question. A professing Christian should avoid even the appearance of evil.

G. H. B., Addison, N. Y. What you ask about Paul would require a very long and labored answer. Large volumes have been written on this subject. You should take the first opportunity to look up Paul's journeys in some good Bible encyclopedia, which you will find in almost any good library.

D. G. G., Madison, Ind. 1. The Ethiopians belong to the black or dark-skinned race, known generically as the negro race. 2. There are many differing views concerning entire sanctification. All theological schools agree that perfect deliverance from sin is an essential part of the plan of redemption, but they differ regarding the time when such deliverance is to be accomplished. The majority hold life to be continual warfare against sin and that no one can attain perfection in this life.

The Shah's Footmen

Interior of the Palace of the Shah at Teheran

The Crown Prince and His Tutors

PERSIA'S CONSTITUTIONAL STRUGGLE

FROM being one of the most stable royal seats, the famous Peacock Throne of Persia has become one of the most uncomfortable for the "king of kings," as the Shah's title reads. After a short but decisive struggle, the Shah, on July 16, abdicated and the young Crown Prince was officially proclaimed the new ruler in his stead. The struggle between the old system of absolute monarchy and the new one of a government under a constitution has now been going on for some time with varying fortune. Civil war has raged over a great part of the empire, and, at this writing, cable dispatches have announced that the Nationalists have entered the capital, Teheran, in force, after severe fighting.

The events leading up to the taking of the city came in rapid succession, and proved a surprise to the watching diplomats, so quickly did one stirring event follow another. The facts of Persia's temporary constitutional experiment and of the grasping of supreme power again by the Shah, are matters of world knowledge. For a time it looked as if it would be long before another parliament held its sessions, but events in distant parts of the country gave the Nationalists, or Constitutionalists, new hope. The various tribes, under their Nationalist military chiefs, revolted and the Shah soon found that he had to cope with an increasing force of malcontents, who took town after town and then began to gather in towards the walls of Teheran.

Russia soon took a hand in the struggle, as the nearest European power and the one claiming to be most interested in the preservation of order. Russian officers were loaned to the Shah, and a Russian force sent into the country. During the first week of July the rebels advanced to within fifteen miles of Teheran, under the command of two experienced officers, Sipahdar and Sardarasad, two as war-wise fighters as may be found in "unconquered" Persia.

On July 11, a force of Persian Cossacks and other troops, to the number of 1,200, all under the command of borrowed Russian officers, fought the last battle outside the city. They advanced to drive the rebels from their intrenchments. First, with field pieces, they bombarded the enemy for two hours, and the air was filled with the shriek of shells and the roar of the explosions, but the cannonade was insufficient to dislodge the rebels. Then the Cossacks advanced, keeping up a steady fire from their Maxims and other quick-firing guns. The rebels waited until they were well within range and then opened on them, compelling the Cossacks to retire.

The Nationalists, however, must have been disheartened, as they fell back to the town of Dehshah. During the fight, reinforcements left the city at intervals to strengthen the royal forces, and the people stood upon the housetops in a fruitless endeavor to see something of what was transpiring in the distance. Only the march of troops toward the front and the low growl of cannon along the horizon could be made out.

Troops Defending a Bazaar in Persia

The Nationalists within Teheran began to arm their adherents with weapons taken from their secret stores, while the more peaceful part of the population began to swarm into the legation quarter, thinking it safest if fighting were to occur in the streets. The Russian commander of the city did not feel that he could spare more men to fight in the field, and made arrangements to protect the Shah within the city.

Russia started a relief column from Epzele, a Persian seaport on the Caspian. It was composed of 1,800 picked men. The Persians looked askance at this column of well-drilled men marching up toward their capital. The cities through which they passed were as silent as if stricken by the plague, the people remaining indoors until the burly strangers passed on. The tribesmen, on July 13, made a night march, carefully concealed from the royalist troops. A few kept them in play, while Sipahdar and Sardarasad, with the main army, swept around to the north, captured the gates and soon held half of Teheran.

The assailants found a large part of the population friendly to their cause, and the officers kept their men under control in order that there might be no revulsion of feeling. It was an indication of the great change that has taken place in Persia when a city could be taken and order preserved afterward. Usually, looting and bloodshed has been the order of the day.

The Shah's troops, taken by surprise, were unable to offer organized resistance. Here and there a little band held a square or corner, but were soon shot down or ridden over by a wave of mounted tribesmen. The royal troops that surrendered probably expected the fate so often meted out in the past to the conquered in Eastern wars, but were greatly surprised when only their weapons were taken from them and themselves pledged to inaction against the cause of the constitutionalists.

On July 16, the Shah abandoned the struggle and took refuge in the Russian legation. Here he declined to receive a deputation, who were instructed to notify him officially of his deposition. The Nationalist leaders then notified the British and Russian legations that the National Council had decreed a change of sovereigns.

The Shah, having left the throne voluntarily, is regarded as having abdicated. The young Crown Prince, Ahmed Mirza, has been proclaimed Shah.

GOD'S MEMORY-BOOK

TEXT—Mal. 3 : 16, 17

WE are all greatly interested in books and magazine articles which describe the inner life of great men, or which give the essential spirit of epoch-making movements. It has thus come to pass that Boswell's Life of Johnson has had a wide reading. It is a unique biography of a striking man, by a devout hero-worshiper. Boswell was a Scotchman, having been born in Edinburgh. While on a chance visit to London, in 1763, he met Dr. Johnson and conceived an unbounded admiration for that remarkable man. He went with him to the Hebrides in 1773, and some time afterward wrote his Journal. Johnson died in 1784, and five years later Boswell wrote the Life of Johnson. Mr. Trevelyan performed a somewhat similar service for his uncle, Lord Macaulay. This latter is one of the finest biographies of our time. But the most striking illustration of the principle which I have now enunciated, and am striving to illustrate, is found in the Memoirs of Lucien Bonaparte, regarding his great brother Napoleon. Joseph was the eldest brother of Napoleon, and Lucien was six years the junior of Napoleon. The crowns of Italy and Spain were offered to Lucien, on condition that he would divorce his wife; but he preferred to go into retirement with the wife he loved. Lucien had opposed Napoleon's progress toward monarchy, and his marriage against the wishes of his illustrious brother brought their quarrel to a decisive issue.

The Bonaparte Memoirs

In his Memoirs he tells us all about Napoleon's reasons for selling the Louisiana territory to the United States. He tells how Napoleon debated regarding the possibility of retaining that territory, and not permitting it to fall into the hands of the British should war between France and Britain be declared, and how Napoleon saw that if war did arise this vast domain would assuredly become the possession of Britain. He tells us how Robert R. Livingston, then our Minister in France, wrote to Talleyrand state letters, urging France, if she and Spain could not agree about the ownership of that territory, to permit the sale to the United States. Lucien draws aside the curtain and permits us to see his brother Napoleon, his brother Joseph, his sister Pauline (the wife of General Leclerc), and other members of the Napoleonic family in all the familiarity and intimacy of their daily lives. Lucien gives us glimpses of Napoleon which show him to be neither manly nor heroic. I know of no book which brings us into the family life of a great man, and into the essential spirit of a great movement, as do the Memoirs of Lucien Bonaparte. Possibly the book is not trustworthy in all respects, but it is certainly interesting to a remarkable degree.

I introduce to you a text which draws aside the curtain and permits us to see great movements in social, political and religious life 2,400 years ago. This text introduces us into the social clubs and atheistic coteries and also into the profoundly religious assemblies of the people of Israel 2,400 years ago or more. I draw aside the curtain and permit you to get a glimpse of both classes in that early day: the class that earnestly served God, and the class that rejected God, refusing him obedience and deliberately trampling upon his honor.

The word "then" suggests the time when this great assembly was in session. There were various characteristics of that time. Some of the people plainly, earnestly, devoutly served God, and so proved that they were the true children of God. Others of the people were the pupils of Satan, despising God and rejecting his authority. They probably formed themselves into some sort of social and atheistic clubs, somewhat like the clubs in Paris at the time of the French Revolution. And in these clubs they ridiculed religion, and they supported one another in their opposition to God and to his truth. There were those who spoke, as we see by the context, treasonable words against God. Their words were stout, bold, defiant toward God and his claims upon them. They manifested pride and contempt toward God. They cared not who heard their words; they manifested insolence and disdain toward God and toward his law. Such men live today. Such men made themselves conspicuous last week, attempting or committing murder in public places in these United States, and then defying the law and justifying their act. Human nature is the same in all countries and in all centuries.

There was another class at this time: those who were unwilling to admit their guilt when the indictment was drawn up against them. Men of this class ask the question: "What have we spoken against thee?" They had robbed God of tithes and offerings, and yet they ask: "Wherein have we robbed God?" The writer speaks with amazement; he asks with deep emotion the question: "Will a man rob God?" The question implies that it is almost an impossibility to conceive that men should actually rob God. But are there not men in our day guilty of robbing God? Do we not rob God of time that belongs to him when we fail to give him service at least one day in seven? Do we not rob God when we refuse to give him the money which his cause demands? Do we not rob God when we refuse to give him our love? Love never finds its supreme object until it rests on God. If you love anything, or any person, more than you love God you are robbing God. God should have the first place in our life and in our love. We rob God when we construct plans for life irrespective of God. God should be the goal of all our endeavor; he should be the inspiration of all our achievement; he should be the end of all our attainment. God should be the silent partner in every man's business. If your business will not admit God as a partner, you had better change your business at the earliest possible moment. To-day, as in that early day, there are men who rob God.

Translating Liberty Into License

But I discover from the context that there was still another class: there were those who considered that it was vain to serve God. They had walked mournfully before God. Their argument is that wickedness is the way to prosperity. They believed in a wide-open town. They demanded personal liberty. What do men mean to-day when they demand personal liberty? They mean that they desire the opportunity to do wrong; all recent discussions on this subject, and criticisms of public officials on this line, mean that certain men wish to violate just and wholesome laws. What do men mean when they advocate a wide-open town? Such men translate liberty into license, and would transform the blessings of civilization into the greatest of evils to that civilization. Men so talk even to this day. I heard a merchant say not long ago: "What is the use of my being honest? The man in the same business with me, on the other street, is dishonest. He cheats in weight, he cheats in measure, he cheats in his bills, and the people do not know it, and he seems to be more prosperous than I." Men who speak after this fashion forget that God does not close up men's accounts at sundown every day! Wait a little time. Do not pass a hasty judgment. Wait until God and honest people are through with the dishonest merchant. I remember men who cheered the enterprising bankers who lately added bank to bank and business to business. Where are those bankers to-day? They are dishonored among men, and some of them are jailed with other criminals. Only a few months ago, it was common to hear men praise the enterprise and the genius of some of the insurance men who are to-day in the grip of criminal law. God does not close the account of bankers, merchants and insurance men at the end of each day or week. We all know that there are believers in the atheistic creed that it does not pay to serve God. Let me earnestly exhort you never to adopt that creed; it is an abominable creed; it sours men's lives, it injures business, it dishonors God. It does pay to serve God. It does pay to be honest, to be manly, to be true, to be right before God and among men. Stand in your place and do your duty.

This leads me to speak of the persons present at this meeting spoken of by Malachi, notwithstanding all these adverse environments of which I have spoken. The first characteristic of those in attendance at this assembly is that they feared the Lord—one of the finest descriptions of a true man. We do not, of course, understand by that statement that they possessed a servile or a slavish fear. We do understand by it that they were moved by the fear which a loving child has lest he should offend a loving father. That is the fear of the Lord which is the beginning of true wisdom. This fear is the child of love, and not the mother of cowardice. These men, in contrast to those who despised God and neglected his law, feared Jehovah and walked in harmony with his precepts. His law was their delight, his will governed their action, his love constrained their lives.

God in the Soul and on the Lips

There is another class also which is very interesting to consider, to endorse and to imitate. They are named in this connection as those who spoke often one to another, regarding God and their service of him. Is not that a beautiful characteristic of God's children? It is inspiring to know that they speak often one to another of the things pertaining to their King. I spoke this morning, in the Current Events Class, of an English gentleman whom I knew who invariably uncovered his head when he mentioned the name of Queen Victoria, or whenever her name was mentioned in his presence by another person. There was nothing slavish in his act. It was an act expressive of unbounded admiration for that pure, noble, regnant Queen, who purified, exalted and ennobled every throne and palace in Europe. Here in our Scripture are men who love to speak of God; this fact is a superb recommendation for these men. They kept up the communion of saints by mutual exhortation; they strengthened one another's hands in God; they honored God by their trust and love. They spoke with reverence of God, in the relations which they sustained to him as Creator, Preserver and Redeemer. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak. When God fills the soul, God's name will be on the lips; when our hearts are filled with the things of the King, words regarding the King will overflow from our lips. Evil communications corrupt good manners; and good communications confirm good manners. Why is it that in social life and in business life we talk of politics, of the weather, of business prospects and of social conditions, but seldom speak of God? I was greatly touched the other day when I called upon a business man, who said: "I am so glad you have come. Let us just talk a while about Jesus." The pressure of his business was great, but he dropped everything, that our lips might speak the name of Christ, and that our souls might glow with the love of Christ, and that our faces might be radiant with the glory of Christ. "They spake often one to another," is the beautiful and sublime record of those heroic men of that early day.

Sweet Spiritual Fellowship

Some of you men and women miss much because you are not at the week-night meeting. There we strive to speak often one to another regarding the King. There we uncover our hearts in the presence of Jesus. There is no fellowship on this earth so sweet as Christian fellowship. There is no theme that makes our tongue so eloquent as the love of God. We like to speak of literature, of history, of politics, of economics; but above, around, beneath and beyond all other topics of remark, we love to speak again and again of Jesus. There is no name so sweet on earth, there is no name so sweet in heaven, as the name of Jesus Christ, our adorable Lord and Redeemer.

There are others in this assembly of whom mention ought to be made: those that thought upon God's name. To them that name was sacred; the name stood for God. It was an inspiring source of profound and edifying meditation. It is a psychologic law that thoughts shape lives. "As he (a man) thinketh in his heart, so is he." These are the words of Scripture. They are also the words of metaphysics; they are the words of the highest psychology at the opening of the twentieth century. Every thought makes its track on the brain. Every

AUSTRALIA'S GREAT REVIVAL

By GEORGE T. B. DAVIS

"THE greatest religious movement this continent has ever known" is the way in which Mr. W. Gordon Sprigg, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Melbourne, Australia, describes the revival which has swept over that city under the leadership of Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles M. Alexander and their mission party. The executive committee, in speaking of the movement, says: "A great concern has fallen upon the people. Nothing has been known to equal it beneath these Southern skies. We believe that multitudes of souls have been brought into a saving knowledge of Jesus." Dr. William H. Fitchett, who is perhaps the most influential Christian leader in Australia, in speaking of the work of the evangelists says: "They shook Melbourne in their brief visit as it had never before been shaken. They have quickened the churches into life, and have created for them new ideals." Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander are full of joy over the awakening, and feel that it is one more answer to the petitions of the tens of thousands who are praying for them in America, England and other lands, and their message to the people of America and England is to "keep on praying."

The movement in Melbourne was divided into two parts. For two weeks it was conducted as a simultaneous mission, with meetings held nightly in thirty-three centres. During the last two weeks the services were concentrated in the big Exhibition Building, holding 7,000 or 8,000 people. Night after night it was crowded, with frequently thousands unable to secure admission. The midday meetings were held in the Town Hall, accommodating about 2,500 people. Day after day this great building was packed, sometimes with men only, while the women worshipers filled a large near-by church.

Exhibition Building, Melbourne, Where the Revival Services Were Held

Mr. Alexander' choir numbered about 1,200 voices, from the choirs of three hundred churches. Dr. Chapman's sermons were listened to with deep attention by the great throngs.

The Hon. James Balfour, a member of the Upper House of Parliament in Victoria, who acted as joint treasurer of the mission, gave the following statement summarizing the movement:

"We have had wonderful times in Melbourne during the last month. The Town Hall has had a daily audience of some 2,500 persons—sometimes confined to men only—and yet hundreds have been turned away for want of room. Dr. Chapman has kept this audience spellbound, as for twenty minutes he has preached to them the Gospel of the grace of God, exalting Christ as Saviour, delivering alike from the guilt and from the bondage of sin and calling men to newness of life in strength and power, which Jesus alone can give. Under Mr. Alexander's skilful leadership the whole meeting has sung the sacred songs as one man.

"For two weeks the Exhibition Building has been rushed each evening by a crowd of about 7,000 persons, anxious to join in the songs and listen to Dr. Chapman's pleading. The after-meetings in the banquet hall, where hundreds have come to confess their sins and accept the offer of pardon, have been most solemn. There have been meetings for women, presided over by Mrs. Alexander, and addressed by Mrs. Norton and Mrs. Asher; meetings for personal workers conducted by Mr. Norton; meetings among degraded ones and prisoners by Mr. and Mrs. Asher; meetings for the young, undertaken by the Rev. Dr. Ottman and Mr. Dickson; and other agencies. Dr. Chapman has also specially addressed ministers, church officers, students, colleges for boys and for girls; and one matter he has made a very strong point of, viz., that if the spiritual revival is to be of permanent good it must be maintained by the regular ministers in their own congregations by determined evangelistic effort and by careful tending of those recently brought to the knowledge of Christ."

The hearts of the evangelists are full of gratitude and praise. Dr. Chapman said: "The work surpassed my highest expectations. But the size of the audiences was not the most imposing feature. It was the spirit of conviction, and the apparently genuine conversions. Men came to Christ literally by the hundred, and one night Mr. Alexander and I took the hands of between 2,500 and 3,000 people as they came forward to pledge themselves to Christ, as a result of the mission in the central district alone."

act affects every muscle, and makes the repetition of that act easier for good or for evil. Every man is, in large part, what he thinks. The man who says "I will" is enabling himself to do the thing that he wills. Every man who says "I cannot" soon will be unable to do the thing. To say earnestly and determinedly "I can" is largely to be able soon to say "I have done it." Here is a great law, which sweeps through all life. Men are what they think, regarding education, health and religion. The man who believes he is sick will soon be sick; the man who will not believe it probably will not have to believe it, at least not so soon as the other man. Nothing is more certain than that. Men who think constantly, believingly and lovingly about God come to be like God. Living with God, we gain God's image. Living with God, we think God's thoughts and strive to rise to God's ideals. Men who live with him become like him. You remember the Scripture tells us that, at the last, we shall see Christ as he is and we shall be like him. The man and woman who have lived together for half a century as husband and wife come to be like each other; they look like each other after a while, and they speak like each other. They are one, their lives blend, their souls intertwine. Their speech is like that of the children of a common mother. Lift that thought to God. It is gloriously true that you become like God. There was a dear brother who labored in this church as one of my helpers for many years, in whose case heaven was not much of a change; he was living in heaven all the time; to him this earth was, in a real degree, heaven; he did not have to change much, when he saw Jesus as he is, because he had changed so much already into the image of Jesus. He was like the apostle John: toward the close of that apostle's life, there was very little of John left; his life was nearly all Jesus. God grant that our meditation upon Him be sweet and constant!

Now, I close by calling your attention to the rewards of such worship: such worshipers were noticed by God. God hearkened and heard their words. You remember that, in the fortieth Psalm, we read: "He inclined unto me, and heard my cry." The picture there is very suggestive. It represents God as leaning forward and bending down his ear and hearing the cry of his children. So we have a somewhat similar picture here. God heard their words. He even noticed their thoughts. The unspoken words were known to God and appreciated by God.

Such worshipers, we discover further, have their names registered in God's memory-book. There is here an allusion to the custom of kings who kept records of those who had performed signal service and had achieved illustrious deeds expressive of their loyalty to the king and to the throne. Mr. Andrew Carnegie has special and valuable rewards for heroes, and he has his men in different countries keeping records of those who deserve such recognition and reward. The great God, sitting on the throne of the universe, has his memory-book. He does not need a memory-book, for God could not and would not forget. But he speaks in this Scripture after the manner of men. So he records the words, he notes the deeds, he honors the thoughts of his children. God has a bottle for the tears of his saints, and God has a book for the thoughts of his children.

There is a further reward: "They shall be mine . . . even mine own possession." The word here translated jewels in the King James Version is not translated correctly. The word here does not mean jewels nor gems. Some preachers have erred at this point; they have gone off into rhapsodies, describing the jewels of the great crowns of the world; but that is not the thought here. The idea is far and away beyond that of any jewel; it rises far above the most precious stones. It is God's peculiar treasure. The Latin of it would be peculium; the Hebrew of it is segullah. What is there that you call your peculiar treasure—that which is dearest? Perhaps it is a keepsake of your mother, of your husband, of your wife, of a child gone home. It is dear to you; you would not part with it for the world. Now God, speaking after the manner of men, says: "You are to me [if you are a faithful follower and a devout worshiper] as dear as the dearest thing on earth is to you." How God longs to enfold us in his arms and to his heart! Why are you a prodigal, when God would make you a son? Why are you a rebel, when God would make you a child? Come home, wanderer; come to-day, to God's feet, to God's throne, to God's heart. O child of God, meditate on God; meet with his people, "not forsaking our own assembling together, as the custom of some is," so that God may look down upon you, write your name in his book and make you, at the last, his peculiar treasure.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—EVANGELIST H. W. BROMLEY has just concluded a series of meetings at Wessington Springs, S. Dak. About 250 professed conversion.

—EVANGELIST E. PAYSON HAMMOND is requested to send his address to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some four hundred of his converts of many years ago are to meet in reunion at Harrisburg, Pa.

—THE BACCALAUREATE SERMON at the Northfield commencement was preached by Rev. W. W. Weeks, D.D., of Springfield. The dedication of the Russell Sage Memorial Chapel, another gift of Mrs. Russell Sage, came at 3:30. Rev. David James Burrell, D.D., of New York, gave the address.

—MISSIONARY SARAH WIRT PEOPLES writes from Nan, via Bangkok, Siam: "Rice is dearer in Nan than in any other place in the north. Yesterday boats arrived from the lower river, bringing rice from Bangkok (over five hundred pounds). This will enable us to feed many who are suffering, including lepers and beggars, who besiege our gates."

—THE CHEROKEE NATIONAL SEMINARIES, at Tahlequah, Okla., have closed their careers as tribal schools, which many of the Cherokees greatly regret. These institutions have done an excellent work among the tribe for more than half a century, and have been a great aid to Indian civilization.

—SEVENTY-THREE OUT-DOOR evangelistic meetings are now being conducted each week under the auspices of the National Bible Institute, of New York. They are attended by an aggregate of 10,000 men weekly. For the meetings on the Bowery, of which there are now being held three each night and five on Sundays, a specially constructed Gospel wagon is used. It provides a platform for the speakers, seats for the singers and a place for an organ. The Bowery meetings are under the supervision of John Hollis, superintendent of the Mission of the Living Waters.

—REV. MILTON WRIGHT, D.D. (the father of Wilbur and Orville Wright, the famous aeronauts), was born in Rush County, Indiana, in 1828, joined the United Brethren Church in 1847, was licensed exhorter in 1850 and ordained preacher in 1853. He filled various pastorates successfully; was elected presiding elder in 1866, and chosen as editor of the Religious Telescope in 1869. Was appointed Bishop of the Pacific Coast in 1885; served as Bishop sixteen years. In his fifty-eight years of active ministerial life he has held nearly every office in the church. His wife, who died in 1889, was Susan Katharine Koernor. He has four sons and one daughter living. Since his formal retirement he has been active in various capacities, editing, publishing, lecturing, etc. He has many warm friends all over the country, and especially in the West.

—MISSIONARY W. HAGQVIST, of Sian-fu, Shensi, China, writes appealing for support for six native helpers, viz., Liu Sien Seng, school teacher and evangelist; Huang Yong Chang, school teacher and evangelist; Lao Huang, evangelist; Wang Chao Si, Bible-woman; Yang Liang Si, Bible-woman; Ly Si Niang, Bible-woman. The support is $50 a year each. Ly Si Niang has been a Bible-woman for a number of years, doing the work without salary, but now she is a widow and needs support. Applications for taking up these helpers, under the "native substitute" plan, may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HOW PERU'S REVOLUTION FAILED

By A. R. Stark, Callao

"THIS is the quietest town I've struck for a long time," said one of a group of Americans standing at the corner of Lima's historic plaza. "Everything is so peaceful, and all so polite."

Dr. D. Matto
Minister of Public Works

Without a moment's warning, the Plaza de Armas was startled by the sound of firearms in the government palacio. Shops were instantly closed, and bystanders and others fled in every direction for refuge. What did it mean?

A group of discontented politicians, representing the Democratic party, had entered the palace from two entrances, shot down several of the guards and overpowered others, making the President and several of his Ministers prisoners. The whole thing was so daring and unexpected that the news fell like a bomb on the community and for the time being stunned everybody. The various Ministers were overpowered before they realized what had taken place. The President was dragged from the palace, paraded through the streets of Lima and led to the statue of Bolivar, in the Inquisition Square, and there asked to sign his resignation as President of Peru. He ran a narrow escape of being shot. In the face of imminent danger, the President bravely withstood the demand, and the army, on which the rebels depended, proved loyal to the government.

Inquisition Square, as well as the government palace, was the scene of considerable bloodshed. All around the famous statue of Bolivar lay the dead and the dying, many of them innocent citizens. The palace of the government was eventually retaken by the army, the President rescued from the hands of the rebels and again installed in the executive office, along with his Ministers.

The leaders in this revolt were Isaias and Amadeo Purola, sons of an ex-President, and Carlos Purola, a brother. In Lima, the greatest alarm and confusion naturally followed, and there is still considerable unrest in the public mind.

The Minister of Public Works, Dr. David Matto, a learned bacteriologist, has watched with keen interest and sympathy the social, moral and spiritual influence of Protestant enterprise in his country, and on more than one occasion he has rendered valuable medical service in missionary homes in Peru. As president of the Anti-Alcohol Congress in Lima in 1903, where it was shown that drink was an unrestrained curse in Peru, Dr. Matto had a great opportunity of starting an anti-liquor crusade. He was not slow to recognize the services Protestant enterprise was rendering to the temperance cause. During the sessions the recognition and co-operation of Protestant missionaries was opposed, on the ground that the Roman Church "had always been exclusively recognized, protected and sustained by the state." Dr. Matto, who was born in the historic city of Cuzco and is a Quichua scholar, on different occasions has been the honored delegate of his country. Recently he was sent to the Scientific Congress in Chile; he was also a delegate to the Medical Congress in St. Louis, U. S. A., where he had an opportunity of appreciating the enormous wealth and progress of the great Republic of the North.

In the new era that is dawning for Peru, Dr. Matto's sister, Señora Clorinda Matto de Turner, is entitled to honorable mention. She is a distinguished Peruvian writer and the author of several books, of which Birds Without Nests has been translated into English. The translation hardly does justice to the book, which, as its title suggests, is an exposure of the wicked conduct of many Peruvian priests. As a Peruvian lady, born and bred in the sierra of Peru, she not only is intimately acquainted with the mountain life of the Inca Indian, but is an eminent Quichua scholar. This distinguished lady has been closely identified with the American Bible Society, translating the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles and some Epistles into Quichua, the language of three million Indians scattered over the great highlands of Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador. May its message resound through the sierra!

Our Bible evangelists, with wallets of books and selections of Scripture cartoons, go about boldly displaying the great parables which Christ set forth to the peasants of Galilee. One of these workers turns to the parable of the Sower, while seemingly all the idle men in Lima stand still to look and listen. How well these parables suit the needs of the multitudes to-day in Peru! Some of the listeners have their small chacritas, where, as part of their daily duty, they till the land, sow the seed, tend the grain and wait for the harvest; others have to win their bread by the sweat of their brow, while others have had to make their bread after the manner of the small bread-makers in Peru. All these conditions of men gather round the colporteur. Some, it may be, scoff and laugh; but many purchase the Book containing the great truths of the kingdom of God.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

THIS coming fall the distant but important Territory of Alaska will have a new executive, Mr. Walter E. Clark, whose appointment as Governor has just been confirmed by the United States Senate. Mr. Clark is a native of Connecticut, but has spent the last few years in the national capital, where he won a reputation as a capable and energetic newspaper man. He represented the New York Sun, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, and other prominent papers. Mr. Clark will assume the duties of his new office on October 1. There was a time, not so many years ago, when the post of Governor of Alaska was little sought after; in fact, no one wanted the position, providing he could get something else. Now, all this is changed. Fleet steamers ply regularly between the coast towns of the Territory and Seattle and San Francisco. The population is increasing, and the exhibits of its products at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition at Seattle show what are its future possibilities. The Governorship is accordingly rated as a desirable post. Mr. Clark's experience as a newspaper man will stand him in good stead, for to be successful in that profession a man has to be a good judge of men and measures. There are at present a large number of newspaper men holding positions under the government, both at home and abroad. At one time the consular service was composed largely of journalists who had taken an active interest in political affairs.

New York's police force has been compared to an army, and quite truthfully, for there are several independent States in the world which have not such a well drilled force at their disposal. It is organized on quite military lines, its mounted traffic squads drilling weekly as cavalry and the foot police marching like infantry in their annual parades. General Theodore A. Bingham, who has been the efficient Police Commissioner since January, 1906, has retired from office and Mr. W. F. Baker, who has been connected with the police department for a number of years, has been appointed by Mayor McClellan to the position. Mr. Baker has not been prominently in the public eye, serving quietly and effectively in his previous positions.

Those who thought "the lid" in New York would fly off as soon as General Bingham left office have not had their expectations realized. Commissioner Baker informed the force that he expected every man to do his full duty. New York's guardians of the peace now number about ten thousand men, of whom over five thousand are on duty in old New York, the present Borough of Manhattan.

America lost one of its great scientific minds when Professor Simon Newcomb died in Washington July 12. Professor Newcomb was actively engaged on his astronomical work almost until the end. He had the happiness, so often denied to men who make great discoveries, of having his work highly appreciated during his lifetime and his fame only bounded by the limits of civilization. Professor Newcomb was descended from an old and distinguished family, which came to New England in 1660. Before the Revolution they moved to Nova Scotia, and it was there that the future astronomer was born, in 1835. He began to study arithmetic at the age of five, and at thirteen he was taking up Euclid. In 1853 he came to "the States."

For a while he taught school. Then he was appointed computor on the National Almanac, and his career fairly began. He attended Lawrence Science School, and his experiments while there made his reputation international before the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1861 he was made professor of mathematics in the United States Navy and made his home in Washington.

His greatest triumph was the accurate determination of the elements of the solar system. He was a member of practically every prominent scientific society in America, universities on both sides of the water had given him honorary degrees, and his home contained letters of congratulation and handsome gifts from various European rulers.

GENEVA HONORS CALVIN'S MEMORY

IN Geneva, Switzerland, there has just been celebrated, with interesting ceremonies, the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of the city's great adopted son, John Calvin; and the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the University of Geneva by the reformer.

The central feature in the jubilee was the laying of the foundation stone of the International Monument of the Reformation. Delegates from Germany, Great Britain, France, Holland, Hungary and the United States were present to honor the occasion. The ceremonies served to revive memories of the life and times of Calvin, and every spot actually or traditionally associated with his name has been visited by the delegates.

When Calvin died, he directed that no stone should mark his grave, and his wish was so well respected that today it is only tradition that locates, in the sequestered cemetery at Plainspalais, under the shade of a willow tree, a tablet with the initials "J. C." indicating the supposed spot.

It was not until generations after his death, in 1835, that a movement was begun to secure some suitable memorial of the great reformer, who had shed such lustre on the city. Nothing came of the movement then, but in 1864, the anniversary of his death, the project was again taken up, and a memorial hall was erected, which respected the aversion Calvin was known to have to monuments. The memorial took the form of the Salle de la Réformation, near the Quai. It was dedicated to the advancement of religion and morals. It contains a concert hall and a Calvinium, where relics of the reformer are preserved.

In 1906, with the approach of the quadricentennial of his birth, a world movement was started, which resulted in the founding of the Association of the Reformation, to commemorate the historical results of Calvin's labors. Professor M. Lucien Gautier was elected president of the association, which originated the idea of the International Monument of the Reformation, and it was planned to lay the foundation stone on the 400th anniversary of the birth of John Calvin.

The ceremonies attending the laying of the foundation stone revived stirring memories of the past. The site is on the line of the former ramparts, built to protect the city against the sudden attacks of the Savoyards. When this rampart was removed, in the nineteenth century, a botanic garden was laid out around it and the Promenade des Bastions took its place. Upon a base of a portion of the ancient wall, and at a point to the right of the central gate, will be a new "Mur de la Réformation," or wall of the Reformation, to serve as the background for the statuary and inscriptions. This remarkable monument, when completed, will show a central group of figures, representing the reformers Farel and Calvin, Knox and Beza. Figures of the representative supporters of the Reformation will appear on either side, among them being Coligny, of France; William the Silent, of Holland, and Oliver Cromwell, of England. America is to be represented by a typical Puritan figure. The Swiss sculptor, Alphonse Laverriere, will execute the figures on the monument.

The University of Geneva, Founded by Calvin

The site is admirable. Behind are the university buildings; before it rise the terraced slopes upon which "Geneva the beautiful" has grown to its present grandeur, with many of its features unchanged from the stirring time of the Reformation. The main inscription, "Post Tenebras Lux" (Light After Darkness), is carved on the wall monument.

The story of Calvin, the French scholar who became the reformer, commenced in Geneva in 1536, where he took up his residence on the earnest solicitation of Farel to aid him in obtaining a purified religion. For two years Calvin worked, when he retired to Strasburg; but, recalled by the Genevese in 1541, he returned and lived in that city until his death in 1564. A tablet is now seen at No. 11 Rue Calvin, marking the site of the house in which he resided from 1543 until his death. The actual house was, unfortunately, torn down in 1706.

His life at Geneva was spent in his labors as a reformer, preaching at the cathedral and lecturing at the Academy, which he founded in 1559. The three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Academy, now the University of Geneva, was celebrated with much form and ceremony.

The celebrations of the birth anniversary began Thursday, July 1, when the delegates were received. Next evening Professor E. Doumerge spoke on "Calvin, the Preacher of Geneva," in the Cathedral of St. Pierre. On Saturday a cantata, "Post Tenebras Lux," was given at the cathedral. On the following Sunday services were held in all the churches, and a second rendering of the cantata was given. There were also excursions, and an illumination in the evening.

On Monday, July 5, a school commemoration was held. On this day began the particular ceremonies connected with the laying of the foundation stone of the monument by a reception given by M. de Bouvier. Next day, Tuesday, July 6, there was another reception in the chapel of the Escalade, with addresses. The laying of the foundation stone took place at noon, with addresses in the morning by speakers from different countries, after which the delegates visited the different exhibitions organized for the jubilee.

The Protestant churches of the United States invited to send representatives were: The Presbyterian Church of America, he Unitarian Church, the Reformed Church of America, the Presbyterian Church of the United States, the Reformed Church of the United States, and the Presbyterian Alliance. Church representatives were also invited from France, Great Britain, Canada, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Russia, etc. The United States had a large representative committee, of which Theodore Roosevelt was honorary chairman.

BILLY BROWN'S LONG TRAMP

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

"TEACHER, dere's a boy down by de Lodge, 'n he won't speak, 'n he looks awful, 'n I—I guess he's sick. Wot'll I tell him?"

Thus spoke Jakey, the janitor's boy, to one of the teachers at Mont-Lawn, one hot day, as he stood hat in hand before the Homestead piazza, where the superintendent was sitting.

"Tell him to come right up here, and help him along," said she.

Off ran Jakey, soon returning with a most forlorn specimen of boyhood. "Come right up here, and tell me what is the matter," said the superintendent.

The boy never moved, but stood like a veritable reed shaken by the wind, swaying, and apparently unable to step further. Taking him by the hand, the superintendent led him to a chair. "Now, sit down and tell me your name and how you came here." "I'm Billy Brown, an' I walked."

"Where do you live?" "One Hundred and Twenty-first Street, New York."

"When did you leave home?" "Yesterday morning."

Further questioning drew from the boy the story of his tramp. Billy had been one of Mont-Lawn's guests last season; but he was now too old to come, as he had passed the age limit. (No one, however, would have thought this possible, as he was so small and puny.) His father said he must get a job. There are five other children, he being the oldest. The father further emphasized his declaration with sundry blows and kicks,

"Ye see, dad drinks," said Billy, "'n he's awful w'en he gits them spells. I didn't know where to go for a job; nobody wants such a kid as me. So I beats it fur Mont-Lawn. I telled me mudder I was agoin'. Dad don't lick her no more; she's too sick. I beats it up de track to Yonkers," he went on, "'n den it gits dark 'n I couldn't go no furder, me feet wuz so sore. So I jest lays down by de track, 'n dat's all I knowed till de mornin', when I ups 'n on agin."

In reply to the question as to where he got his food he said, between gulps that would have been sobs had he let them out, "Didn't have nuttin'. A man give me ten cents fur helpin' wid his grip, 'n I saved it to cross de ferry at Tarrytown."

It was high noon when Billy arrived at Mont-Lawn, and he had not had a morsel of food since leaving his poor home the morning before. After being washed, fed and put to bed, and after a long sleep, he came out a new boy, very anxious to help with the little children. When he was told he could stay at least ten days, his joy knew no bounds. A new suit of clothes and a pair of soft-soled "sneakers" (shoes) seemed to complete his happiness. Every day was a gain in weight of body and a loss in heaviness of spirit.

"Say, kid, come down to de ball field," cried Jakey; "us fellers is goin' to have a game, 'n if yer can't play, 'n is too tired ter holler, w'y jest set dere 'n look on," and off they go together, Billy's big eyes wider open than ever and glistening, not with tears, but with real joy.

The summer days pass quickly at Mont-Lawn, and our little guests enjoy every hour of them. Next to the ball games they love roaming in the woods, under the kindly leadership of a teacher, who tells them all about the curious and beautiful things that grow in shady nooks and introducing by name the golden-throated songsters that flit from branch to branch of the towering old trees. Saturday afternoons there are games on the lawn, led by Dr. Klopsch himself. The vesper service in the beautiful "Children's Temple" is held every evening. Every Sunday there are interesting talks by men of wide reputation, who "love God and little children." All these enjoyments, united with abundant food, and peaceful slumbers in a clean white bed, soon gave to Billy renewed strength and courage. To put it in Jakey's own words, "Dat sickly kid would be gittin' fat if he wasn't so t'in, but sho', wasn't he a sight w'en he struck dis place! I'm a gittin' so fat meself dat me own mudder won't know me, 'n Tony didn't tell me de half erbout de Home. He never sed a word erbout dat swing log, w'ere a hundred kids kin swing at wonct. I'll bet Tony didn't know erbout it, for I heard de lady wot rings de dinner bell 'n talks to us in de Temple say dat swing wuz new dis year, an' dat de idea cum from Chiny an' dat de boys called it de "draggin' boat" (dragon boat). My, but dem little Chinks must have a good time in Chiny, if dat's de kind o' swings dey have."

Great Gifts to Education

BY his recent gift of $10,000,000 to the Rockefeller Foundation of the General Education Board, Mr. John D. Rockefeller has brought the grand total of his contributions to the cause of religious and secular education and general philanthropy up to the amazing figure of $112,655,000. Of this amount $53,000,000 is under the control of the General Education Board, for the endowment of colleges and universities. Roundly, it is understood that ninety-five per cent. of all of his gifts have gone for the general cause of education. His first large gift of $10,000,000 was made in 1895; his latest, announced a few days ago, marks his seventieth birthday. In the twelve years intervening, he has given at the rate of $9,500,000 per annum for the cause which to his mind is of the highest importance. Nor can it be said that his gifts have the proverbial "string" attached to them, as many large contributions have had; for he granted to the trustees and others who have received these great donations, the largest freedom of action compatible with the general character of their trust.

There is only one parallel in modern history to these colossal gifts for the cause of education. Almost within a single generation, it has become a common thing for the rich to regularly reduce their vast accumulations in the interest of others. "My church first taught me the duty and the pleasure of giving," says Mr. Rockefeller; and it is a far-reaching testimony, for there are doubtless hundreds who could truthfully relate the same experience. Let us, then, set it down to the credit of the Church that it exerts a most beneficent influence upon those who command great wealth, converting it to a means of widespread blessing and teaching the cardinal principle of Christian trusteeship and the duty of living, not for ourselves alone, but for others.

Providing for Canal Completion

AN important addition was made to the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill on July 15, when, after conferring with the President through Senator Aldrich, it was decided to incorporate in the bill a provision for the issue of $397,000,000 of Panama bonds. This amount is the latest estimate made by Lieutenant-Colonel Goethals, chief of the construction staff, and represents the complete cost of construction. The rate of interest was not announced. The President is exerting himself in many ways to facilitate work on the tariff bill, and is in frequent touch with the conferees for that purpose. In the long battle over the rates, these White House quiet talks have afforded opportunity for conciliation and compromise, which have assisted matters materially.

Where College "Doctors Differ"

WHILE the public rarely takes an active interest in college controversies, it happens just at present to be devoting unusual attention to a controversy which seems to have grown out of a recent speech at Concord, N. H., by President Woodrow Wilson of Princeton University. In the course of his remarks the professor deplored the existing conditions in the average American college. Wealth he considered a grave danger; it was lowering the educational value of college work. Interviewed later, he added:

> There has been a growing disposition to look upon the university as a finishing-off school for young men, a sort of varnishing room where the young man may be coated, more or less thinly, with a veneer of polish, and hung up to dry, and be admired and looked up to by his fellows as one who merely has "been through college." Under present conditions American colleges are playgrounds on which students disport themselves for four years.

President Garfield of Williams College rather "hedged" on the main question, but he believed that, as a nation, we were devoting too much time to diversion. President Schurman of Cornell was more outspoken. He took the view that, in the case of colleges whose students attend chiefly "for the social certificate which enrolment confers," the head of such an institution, watching "his young barbarians all at play," naturally concludes that similar conditions prevail in all of our colleges.

Of course, Dr. Woodrow Wilson didn't mean precisely what he said; nor, for that matter, did the other professors. Our colleges and universities are doing better work than these gentlemen, in their temporarily disgruntled frame of mind, are willing to admit. And, after all, is it not an admirable thing that the youth of our colleges should be trained physically as well as intellectually? The day of the lean and sallow student, jaundiced, melancholy and unfitted for the rough battle of life, is past. Our university product to-day may not be equal in some instances to the wonderful intellectual prodigies we frequently hear of from professors of the "old school," who bowed at the shrine of the classics; but it is at least a hale, hearty, vigorous product, far better equipped, in the great majority of cases, than its predecessors for the fierce struggle and competition of the world of business. The college that holds up high ideals, that aims to develop both body and brain, that gives a worthy purpose and object in life to its students, and that makes of them broad-minded, patriotic, strong, courageous, scholarly men, is doing its work, and a little diversion, more or less, will never rob it of its laurels.

Escaping the Summer's Heat

SUMMER, hailed as the most delightful of the four seasons by poets who live in the country suburbs, and by those who are well enough endowed with this world's goods to be able to go where they please for recreation, is not so much appreciated by the dweller in the city, who must remain within its heated confines.

In the country there comes the heat of the day, but after the sun has tipped the horizon and blinked a red farewell beyond the hills the shades of night usually bring relief. It is far different in the city of the modern cave-dwellers—New York—where people live by the thousand in great structures of stone and mortar and steel. All through the day the sidewalks and towering walls absorb the heat, and, after the sun goes down, give it out once more by radiation, so that humanity turns helplessly from one place to another, seeking a breath of air that does not seem to blow directly from some tropic land immediately around the corner.

Usually, during a long-continued hot wave, the people, by order of the Park Commissioners, are allowed to remain over night in the parks, the police guarding the long lines of exhausted sleepers. For those who can go, the breakers of Long Island offer the greatest relief, and the cars bound to Coney Island, Brighton Beach and the Rockaways are filled to suffocation. Once on the beach it is hard for the city dweller to tear himself away. The Park Commissioners already have allowed the people to sleep over night on the beach under their control, and a gratified sigh of thanks goes up from the thousands who find rest along the sands.

Heroes of the Stormy Surf

MR. HILLES, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, makes an earnest and timely plea in behalf of the hardy workers of the Life-Saving Service. These faithful public servants surely deserve more generous treatment than they have received heretofore. Their duties lead them frequently into positions of great peril, but it is not on record that any one, no matter how black the night nor how furious the storm, ever heard the call to rescue without making prompt and brave response. All up and down our coasts, these brawny, fearless, heroic life-savers have fought out the battle of life and death in the surf, and many a gallant deed has to be carried to their account, which, if done ashore in the sight of men, instead of in the thick and blinding storm, would win the instant admiration and gratitude of the whole country. These gallant heroes of the storm, who save thousands of precious lives every year, should be more liberally rewarded and, as Mr. Hilles points out, their dependent families should not be treated niggardly when they themselves perish or are disabled in the performance of duty. Justice for the life-savers! Let us do better by our unappreciated surf-fighters, the sturdy, iron-muscled men of the lifeboat, the rocket and line, and the breeches-buoy! Their ever-recurring battle with the elemental forces is harder than that of the soldier or even the fireman, and they should be compensated accordingly.

Careless Marriages

IF it be true, as a Chicago city judge recently decided, that a marriage performed by a justice of the peace is not a legal, binding contract, the discovery will no doubt excite a considerable social flutter in some other States besides Illinois. There are probably thousands who have been united by police justices, "for better or worse," who will no doubt regret that they did not show a little more respect for the marriage ceremonial by recognizing that it has a religious as well as a civil side. Christian marriage, at least, has about it a sacramental character which logically calls for the religious authoritative impress of the Church in its solemnization, leaving to the civil law the regulation of those material interests that are involved. A bond so sacred should not be lightly assumed. Doubtless a good deal of the troubles that arise in certain homes might be traced to this early indifference to the sacred character of the marriage compact.

GENERAL NOTES

—NEW YORK CITY'S schools contain about half the total number of school children in the entire State. Of these thirty-seven per cent. are of foreign birth, seventy-six per cent. of foreign parentage, and forty-nine per cent. the sons and daughters of parents who do not speak our language.

—A NEW YORK CITY Court has held that a stepmother has no legal right to compel a child to change her religion, which was that of her dead mother, and that the child should be permitted to decide for herself, when she is old enough, whether she wants to change. This is the first ruling of the kind on record in an American court.

—TWO NOTABLE bronze memorial tablets, one presented by Chicago Congregationalists to the Reformed Church of Amsterdam, Holland, and the other by Rutgers College to the University of Utrecht, were unveiled on July 11. They are commemorative of the arrival of the Pilgrim Fathers in Amsterdam in 1609, and are given in recognition of the hospitality then extended.

— WHAT a tremendous temperance lesson was conveyed in the statement by Sir Ian Hamilton, of Boer War fame, made at a meeting of the Army Temperance Association in London, lately. The General, according to the London Chronicle, admitted that in thirty-seven years he had swallowed some 10,000 quarts of dutiable liquor. It is a confession that needs no comment.

—BY THE generous gift of $100,000 from Mr. Norman W. Harris of Chicago, the Deaconess Pension Fund of the M. E. Church is now assured. Mr. Harris already ranks among the large benefactors of the Church. He recently gave $30,000 to build and equip the Wesley Hospital, Chicago, and there are many other large donations, little known, which have to be placed to his credit, especially in the cause of Home and Foreign Missions.

—MULAI HAFID, Sultan of Morocco, who deposed his half brother only a short time ago, seems destined to have a short and troublous reign. Rebels have seized Fez, his capital, defeating his troops, slaying his servants and compelling Mulai to flee for his life. Anarchy prevails and foreign intervention seems inevitable. Spain and France both have large interests in Morocco, and whether the Sultan be restored to power or not, it is quite likely that there may be an early readjustment of foreign territorial interests in that country.

The New "Clermont" Launched

THE Clermont, an exact copy line for line of Robert Fulton's boat of 1807, has been constructed for use at the Hudson-Fulton celebration, and was launched a few days ago from her ways in the Staten Island Ship-building Company's yards. Quite a fleet of boats, little and big, went down from New York to witness the ceremonies. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Charles A. Cassidy and then Captain J. W. Miller, chairman of the Commission's Committee on Naval Parade, introduced General Stewart L. Woodford, president of the Hudson-Fulton Celebration Commission, who made a brief address, saying among other things:

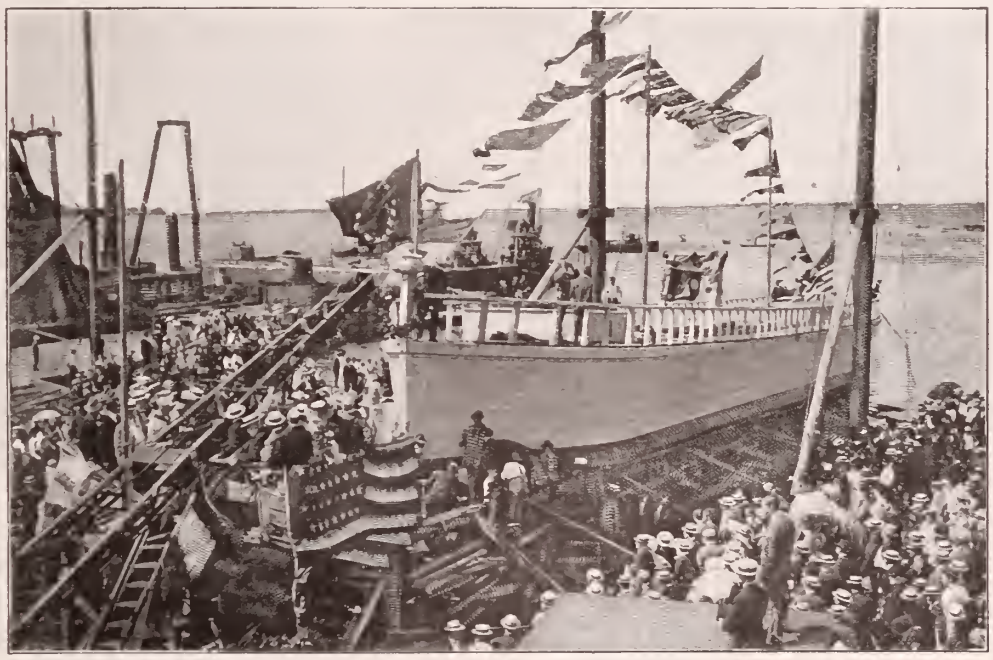
"This is a glorious occasion. The events we commemorate with our celebration this year are great events. They are both the work of noble men, who worked under great obstacles. Fulton, to whose memory we fitly turn to-day, was not merely a great inventor. The great country to whose material prosperity he gave so much should love his memory not alone because of the practical services which he performed for her, but also as a true-hearted patriot, who scorned to profit by any contract which might lessen her strength in war or her happiness in peace."

Then Eben C. Olcott, chairman of the Clermont Commission, presented the bell which summoned passengers aboard the old Clermont, and Mrs. R. B. Bowler, a descendant of the inventor, pulled the rope and rang a few strokes. As the vessel slipped slowly down into the water, Mrs. Arthur Taylor Sutcliffe, great-granddaughter of Robert Fulton, broke against the stem of the vessel a slender, filigreed vase of water, from the well on the estate of Chancellor Livingston, Fulton's patron, and said:

"I name thee Clermont, and again auspiciously proclaim to the American people the sentiments of Robert Fulton, as expressed in an essay to the friends of mankind: 'Industry will give abundance to a virtuous world and call mankind to one unbroken feast of harmony and friendship. The liberty of the seas will be the happiness of the earth.'"

As the glass broke, the Wasp fired the first shot of a sixteen-gun salute, one for each of the sixteen States of 1807, and the whistles of the vessels shrieked themselves hoarse. The Clermont was towed to a shipyard pier, where she will take on her engines and equipment, and the delegations, naval and civil, returned to the city. The Hudson-Fulton celebration is a good thing for the present generation. These men are beyond the reach of our praise. Spectacular demonstrations in their honor will not affect their fame; that is secure forever. The benefit which Fulton bestowed upon his country and age is beyond calculation, and it will do the young people of to-day, and the older ones, a vast amount of good to recognize in a special way the debt of gratitude they owe to the inventor, benefactor and patriot. It was the custom of the Jews, under divine direction, to set up memorials of illustrious events and to express the deepest gratitude and profoundest reverence for the deeds of their ancestors.

I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations. (Ps. 45 : 17.)



The Launching of the "Clermont"

A Boarding-House for Ants

Particular attention is now being directed to certain kinds of plants that furnish lodging-places and boarding-houses for armies of ants. Some of the plants are bored into by ants, and the air passages furnish comfortable houses for their shelter and the rearing of their young, while others contain the food necessary for their support. Mr. Rudolph Beer, in an article contributed to a London scientific paper, thus describes the Macaranga triloba: "This plant is found growing in the neighborhood of Singapore. Its stems are hollow and divided into chambers by a series of diaphragms, which, however, become perforated. Ingress and egress to and from the cavity are afforded by the little holes which are bored through the walls of the stem, along a groove of thin tissue that extends above the point of leaf insertion. At the base of each leaf-stalk is a pair of curiously shaped stipules, which are pressed against the stem. Over the concave surface of these stipules are arranged a number of little hair-shaped or spherical, golden-yellow food bodies. The tips of the teeth along the margin of the leaf are converted into little cup-shaped glands, which secrete nectar, no doubt for the benefit of the ant. In the hollow stem are not only adult ants, but their young and their eggs." How completely has the heavenly Father provided for the support of all his creatures, irrational and rational, and how confidently his children rest in the arms of his Providence!

Your heavenly Father feedeth them. (Matt. 6 : 26.)

Steel-Workers and Temperance

A gray-haired employee of the Carnegie Steel Company staggered into the building to his work in an intoxicated condition. He was pointed out to Mr. Henry C. Frick, who put him in a cab and sent him home. This was not all he did. He visited the other steel magnates in Pittsburg, and entered into an agreement with them that all the workers in the steel mills should take a pledge of total abstinence, which should insure soberness during business hours, with more and better work. It is understood that the new men applying for work will be required to be temperate, but the 60,000 men now at work will be asked to sign the pledge. Thus we have another illustration of the economic reason for the abolition of strong drink, which is becoming so common in the industrial institutions of the country. This and the sentimental and moral reasons are making a ceaseless warfare against the American saloon.

Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons forever. (Jer. 35 : 6.)

Millionaires Attend Church

The pastor of an important pulpit in a large city recently declared that not fifty of the rich men of his city attended church. A Chicago paper took up the statement and questioned it, and wrote letters to certain ministers of large cities, asking their opinion on the subject. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, in one of the last letters he ever wrote, answered that he did not know many rich men, but, "as it happens, all that I do know have been very regular attendants at church." Dr. Parkhurst said: "Almost all of those who in this city are phenomenally wealthy and whose names are widely known, such as the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Morgans and the Kennedys, and I might add the names of several representative families, such as the Dodges, the Jameses, the Jessups, the Hartleys and the Stokeses, not only attend church but are contributors to the maintenance of the church." Dr. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, wrote: "The strongest men in this city, financially and socially, are in the churches." Dr. Mills, of St. Louis, wrote that he found in his congregation a number of men of large wealth in positions of leadership in St. Louis. The pessimist sees no workingmen in the churches, and no rich men worth considering. The optimist, or even the one who looks with healthy vision, will find vast numbers of the workingmen and numbers of merchant princes worshiping in God's temples. It would be better for both the rich and the poor, and for the success of the churches themselves, if there could be a little larger mixture of wealth and poverty in the congregation on the Sabbath. Returning from a church service which we had attended with President Roosevelt in Washington, in explaining to us why he worshiped in a comparatively humble church and one whose congregation was of the common people, he said: "My ideal of a church is one where the rich and the poor meet on absolutely the same religious level." Then he commended above others one of the New York City churches where the rich and poor met on terms of spiritual equality and fraternity.

The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all. (Prov. 22 : 2.)

Canaries in Church Service

There is no end to the devices employed by pastors and officers to fill up the pews and revenues of the church. They include everything in the securing of audiences, from the privilege of smoking through the service up to the free musical entertainment as a substitute for the preaching of the Gospel. A church in Cincinnati, O., has, through its pastor, indicated its intention of having three hundred canaries distributed in the auditorium, with the hope that they will give to the service an added charm and novelty. How those three hundred songsters could be anything but a hindrance to the service we cannot understand. The average minister of to-day has about all he can do to keep his audience awake to his message without having to come into competition with the noise in the throats of three hundred feathered songsters. The church cannot make a greater mistake than to adopt spectacular and even questionable methods of church services, as a substitute for the honest, earnest preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. God has arranged it so that his love, manifested in the crucified Redeemer, shall be the theme and influence which is to supply the membership, the audiences and the victories of the Christian Church. It has so happened in the history of this world that the largest audiences that have constantly assembled have been those where Jesus Christ on the cross has been magnified in the sermon and the service.

And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. (John 12 : 32.)

Life-Saver with no Medals

Captain Joseph Zeller, master of the George A. Madill, a ferryboat running between St. Louis, Mo., and the east side of the Mississippi, recently rescued two boys from the river by throwing a line to them. They were Walter Miller and Frank Surney. Their companion in the skiff, however, was drowned. During the thirty years that the captain has followed the river he has saved at least thirty persons. A St. Louis daily gives a graphic record of the heroic rescues effected by him. He did not happen, however, to save the life of a rich man nor the child of a millionaire, but only the plain people who stirred his compassion. He declares that most of those he rescued were so badly frightened and shocked that they did not even thank him. He wears no medals on his breast, he has not yet received the Carnegie badge for courage, and has never been the recipient of a banquet or a testimonial. He says he does not care for these things. He feels happy and proud of the fact that he has had the privilege of saving an average of one life a year during the thirty years that he has been on the river.

That which makes an act really heroic is the unselfish ingredient in it. Heroism is eliminated from human action in proportion to the expectation of personal reward; and yet the richest rewards, in some form or other, are likely to attend unselfish action, and especially in rescuing the lives and souls of our fellow-men from death.

And every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor. (I. Cor. 3 : 8.)

FORCED TO EMBRACE ISLAM OR DIE!

EVERY mail brings further details of the recent massacres in Asiatic Turkey. One of the saddest stories of Kurdish treachery is now brought to light in connection with the massacres of the Armenians of Beilan, who had been given assurances of protection on yielding up their arms.

Kara Khan is a village at a point on the Aleppo road. The Moslems of that place assured the Armenians of their assistance and co-operation in the defense, but if they ever intended to help they soon changed and openly joined the ranks of the attacking army as soon as a serious attack was made, which was on Sunday. As most of the houses in Kara Khan were huts, the Armenians took refuge in two stone buildings.

At this juncture, the chiefs of the Moslem hordes, Sheik Omar Agha of Talan Kos, Bekdesh Agha of Kusul Kuyu, Sheik Suleman of Murad Pasha, and Pasha Agha Baitarli, sent word to the Armenians that if they would surrender their arms their lives would be spared. For a time they rejected these overtures, but on receipt of a letter signed by Sheik Omar Agha they yielded. On the 18th they surrendered, and, having given up their arms, they were led to the guard-house. At this pass the Christians were brought to face death or Islam; some chose the former, but most accepted the latter proposal, as they were disarmed and now at the mercy of their cruel betrayers. Those who would not accept Islam were killed, man by man, and those who accepted it were led off like sheep to Sheik Agha Pasha, to the Ziyaret near by. As a company drew near, the old sheik cried, "Don't bring the Kaffirs here; don't bring the dogs here." This cry seems to have been the pre-arranged signal for the slaughter, which was proceeded with with all despatch. After killing all the men and the older boys, the Kurds made off with a few of the younger women, the rest being taken charge of by the old sheik, who kept them in his house for some days and then sent them to Beilan. The total number of men killed is ninety, and nine others are still missing, and the widows and orphans number two hundred and fifty for the whole district.

At the village of Ayas, in Adana province, on April 15, the Moslem population began to prepare themselves for the work of slaughter, sending word to the people of the neighboring villages to come in and assist. The Christians, thinking their object was loot, left their shops and goods and fled to their homes. After looting the Christian shops and houses and burning some, the Moslem hordes fell on their hapless prey. They hunted down and killed the Armenians one by one, according to a list prepared beforehand. In most cases, they separated the Greeks from the Armenians, sparing the former but invariably killing the latter, in many cases in the presence of their helpless wives and children. A young Greek, newly married, shot his young wife as she was being carried off by a Turk, and then met his own end at the hands of his wife's assailants. In and about Ayas seventy-six men and one woman were killed, seventy-one of whom were Armenians and six Greeks. All that is left of the community is some seventy widows and orphans. The only help the local authorities rendered these poor people, till they were rescued by the commander of the Russian gunboat Ouraletz and the dragoman of the American vice-consulate, was to tell them, "Do not fear; there is nothing; everything is all right," though their houses were looted and burned and their husbands and sons killed.

The sufferings of these poor creatures for the first ten days after the massacre were unspeakable. They were divided among the Moslems, to be taken as wives by the fiends who had just made them widows. After ten days, the Russian gunboat came to their deliverance from a living death, and brought them to Alexandretta, where they have been cared for by the Reformed Presbyterian Mission.

This account of the massacre of Ayas was prepared by the son of one of the victims. This young man was just completing his course at St. Paul's Institute, Tarsus. On him now depend a family of seven persons.

Fortunately, the condition of affairs among the refugees is now steadily improving. Relief is coming in in abundance. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Relief Fund is now closed, and next week the final remittance will be forwarded to the committees.

Help for Blindness*

ONE of the first thoughts that is developed in this vividly detailed story of the healing of the blind man is, that he or his parents must have sinned, or else such an affliction would never have been sent upon him.

This thought runs through every heathen religion, and even through the Jewish, and it is naturally a part of any faith in which there is no clear vision of a future state.

The instant that Jesus rose from the dead, and brought life and immortality to light, in that instant the great fact became revealed to men that vice and virtue were to be suitably rewarded in another world than this, and it helped mightily to clear the mystery of thriving sin.

That idea gained such a tremendous hold upon the theology of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries that it practically controlled its whole attitude. "You will be wretched throughout eternity unless you repent and believe," was the whole burden of the old preaching. The far higher motive of the love of God, which should constrain us, was hardly mentioned.

The wrath of Jehovah against the wicked is strongly expressed in the Scriptures. The fate of those who reject his mercy is doubtless too fearful for the imagination to compass; but most ministers no longer use it as a scourge to drive the sinner to his God.

No, the blindness of this man was no punishment meted out to sin; it was, like every other mortal affliction, simply a necessary part of a great and beneficent plan, "that the works of God should be made manifest in him."

It behooves the American of the twentieth century to open his eyes and look about him. There is much to see, yet many do not see it, though schools and churches abound on every side whose especial mission is to teach men Matthew Arnold's great lesson: "to think clear and see straight." Bombast and fustian cannot long deceive any great number of an honest and thoughtful nation. If they are blind to the truth, it is because they are either ignorant or obstinate, and culture should cure men of those faults.

It has taken painful ages for seeing people to appreciate the condition of the blind. Horace Mann, Dr. Howe and their fellow-laborers started the first great movement in our country for their relief. The stories of missionaries give us horrible pictures of the penalties of blindness in pagan countries. In China, they are especially cruel. Let us thank God that in our land so much is done to teach and relieve the blind, and let us all labor in their behalf; for there is much still to be done for them. We should not rest until to every blind child in America is given a chance to acquire an education and to learn a profession.

Many able men have been blind, and yet have left behind them invaluable legacies for the help of mankind. Homer, Ossian, Milton and Blacklock were blind; and the achievements of John Metcalf, a blind man of Manchester, England, were, though in a different and humbler line, no less remarkable. He was, strange to say, a surveyor and projector of highways, and served often as a guide to those traveling by night over intricate, snow-covered roads. In connection with this topic it would be well to read Milton's wonderful Sonnet on My Blindness, and that passage beginning, "Thus with the year seasons return, but not to me returns the day." Few lines so pathetically express the sorrow and isolation of the blind.

The War Curse*

THE fact that concealed weapons are likely to make men quarrelsome has long been recognized. The man who has a loaded revolver in his pocket is too often burning to use it. As Shakespeare somewhere says, "Having the means in hand to do ill deeds, makes ill deeds done."

The same principle applies to nations. This whole theory of building innumerable Dreadnoughts, and enlarging armies and navies, for no existing cause, but simply in order to be ready in case a war should break out, all this is calculated to produce the state of mind in which war becomes feasible and apparently necessary.

We are told in the Psalms that God maketh wars to cease. The soldiers in the Revelation, locusts in terrible shapes, rose from the fumes of the bottomless pit. The inference is plain that it is Satan that inspires wars. May we not also infer that it is Satan that impels parliaments and congresses to vote colossal fortunes for defenses which are not needed and which will, so far as we can judge, never be needed? In any case, they will probably be superseded soon by new inventions. It looks to the unprejudiced outsider like pouring good and vitally needed money into "the unplumbed, salt, estranging sea."

"As much as liet.. in you," says the apostle, "live peaceably with all men." At our present stage of development men know well enough the high advantages of peace; but they seem to be afraid of "emasculation" if they pursue peace—that they may lose "the wrestling thews that throw the world." They forget that we have passed, by a necessary progress, from the brute stage to the man stage. Once our rough ancestors fought with their fists. Then they took billets of wood; then they beat each other with rude iron clubs and pierced each other with spears. Then gunpowder was invented, and the rifle and musket succeeded to the less refined weapons of the earlier time. Now, the implements of death are so terrible that men shudder at the thought of submarine boats, and of guns which can destroy a regiment.

The time seems to have arrived for a still higher and nobler refinement of the art of war. It should be carried on by the weapons of thought. Arbitration should take the place of war.

The barbarous and semi-barbarous tribes and peoples may still require a physical drubbing in order to regulate their relations with their neighbors; but that the so-called Christian nations should ever again go to war one with another is a shocking and revolting thought. God grant that the day of such horrors be past forever.

The mightiest struggles of men are no longer, to any large degree, physical. We fight now against the forces of the prince of the power of the air. No campaigns have ever required greater skill and force.

"War," says Dr. Lyman Abbott, "not only costs beyond all ordinary computation; not only costs lives, beyond famine and pestilence; not only carries tragedies into numberless homes; but it sets on fire the baser passions of men and opens the way to corruption. It is a tremendous temptation to the moral life of the nation."

Remember that the great feature of the millennium is that "the nations shall not learn war any more." Let us all work to hasten that happy day.

Heat Prostrations

WHENEVER a hot wave sweeps over the land so that the air we breathe is like a furnace blast, and the sky is like molten lead, heat prostrations are recorded. Sunstroke is more frequently fatal in the North than in the South, although the thermometer registers a higher degree in Southern than in Northern towns. We are not over-prudent in our way of living in hot weather in the North and West. There should be greater care as to what we eat than is commonly taken. A physician, indicating the best diet for a patient, said to her the other day: "To eat meat in summer is as unnecessary as to wear furs then." Very little meat should be placed upon the family table.

The plainest of food, or even bread and milk, would furnish an excellent and safe lunch during the summer solstice. Fruit and vegetables may be freely eaten. The habit of deluging the stomach with ice-cold drinks when one is very warm is a frequent cause of heat prostration. Victims of the alcohol habit, those who permit their emotions to run away with them and who indulge in anger or passion, and those who are aged and infirm are the principal sufferers from heat.

As for those whose occupations do not take them from home, who can be lightly clad and sit in darkened rooms during the middle of the day, they have no occasion to fret or fume. If one must go out, choose the shady side of the street for walking and carry an umbrella. In July it is as fine a safeguard against sun as against rain.

Whether or not a house is cooler if the windows and doors are kept open through the day, or if the better way is to air the house well in the morning and close the windows between ten o'clock and five, depends largely on where one lives. In the city, closed windows keep out heat, dust and noise. In the country, it is enough to darken the shutters and draw down the shades. Screens at windows and doors are necessary to comfort when flies and mosquitoes invade the atmosphere and make their way into the house. It must be admitted that screens somewhat interfere with the free passage of the air, but of two evils we must choose the lesser. For other summer pests, such as ants and roaches, the only cure is extermination. Radical cleanliness will usually prevent their coming, but particularly in apartment houses they must be fought with determination, and incessant vigilance is essential. No matter how clean one's own house may be one cannot be sure that one's neighbors are equally thorough, and therefore each morning must mean for the housekeeper a tour of inspection through her premises.

The refrigerator may be a source of disease, if it be not constantly looked over and carefully cleansed. Women who do their own work do not need this caution, but those who depend upon maids need not be advised too frequently that they must exercise oversight.

Summer is rapidly flitting away. Almost before we know it its glory will be over and its beauty a dream of the past. After a while we shall hear people complaining of the cold, just as to-day they are lamenting the heat.

The Care of Pets

Children who are encouraged to care for pets possess an advantage over others in having living things dependent upon them for their comfort. The boy who has a dog and the little girl who has a bird or a kitten is developed in responsibility more rapidly than the little neighbor who has no animal friend in charge. Our pets respond marvelously to personal care. To some people a cat is merely a creature that catches mice, and a dog a useful guardian to frighten prowlers away. These people can surely never have had pets in early life. A cat has a great deal of personality. No two pusses are ever precisely alike, any more than two children are. Dogs possess no end of individuality. A lady in New Jersey experimented with two robins, and they became as tame and showed as many loving traits as if they had been born and bred in a cage. If you have pets, do not neglect them. They must have shelter and food, a place to sleep, and water to drink.

RETURN FROM OYSTER FISHING

Back from the task of the toilers, rugged and wet and worn,
They come with the spoils they have gathered, and the world is aflush with morn;
Coming with bread for the children, and bringing the old folks cheer,
There are few in the great earth gladder than these simple fishers here.

What the Clock Says

This poem is a favorite apparently with a number of readers. Several friends have kindly sent a copy, and we are glad to insert it, both for its own beauty and because it is an excellent recitation for children at school:

"What says the clock when it strikes one?
'Watch,' says the clock. 'Oh, watch, little one.'
What says the clock when it strikes two?
'Love God, little darling, for God loves you.'
And tell me, tell softly, what it whispers at three?
Is it 'suffer little children to come unto me?'
'Then come, gentle lambs, come and wander no more,'
'Tis the voice of the Shepherd that calls you at four.
And, Oh, let young hearts with gladness revive
When it echoes as sweetly, 'God bless thee,' at five.
And remember at six, with the fading of day,
That your life is a vapor that passeth away.
What says the clock when it strikes seven?
'Of such is the kingdom, the kingdom of heaven.'
And what says the clock when it strikes eight?
'Strive, strive to enter in at the Beautiful Gate.'
And louder, still louder, it calls us at nine,
And its song is, 'My son, give me that heart of thine.'
Then sweet be your voice responsive at ten,
'Hosanna in the highest! Hosanna, Amen!'
Then loud let the chorus ring on till eleven:
'Praise, praise to the Father, the Father in heaven.'
While the deep stroke of midnight the watchword shall bring,
'Lo, these are my jewels, these, these, saith the King.'"

Chinese Characteristics

THE Oriental ideal of womanhood is low, and centuries of depravity have made the Asiatic foreigner unfit to be trusted in relations of comparative privacy with the women of this country. No one can think for an instant that all Chinamen in the mass are to be condemned because of the fiendish cruelty of two or three among their number. The hordes of Chinese immigrants who have sought our shores are drawn chiefly from the poorest and most ignorant men of the Chinese empire, the majority coming from Canton. They have no family ties, they are here simply that they may earn a livelihood, and the hope in their hearts is that they may amass enough money to make them comfortable at a later period in China. Many of them are hard-working and honest, but there is necessarily a contingent of those who are gamblers and profligates. Unfortunately, as they become Americanized, they do not become Christianized, and when the vices of heathendom are amalgamated with their newly-acquired notions of American freedom the product is one to be dreaded.

Miss Elsie Sigel was the granddaughter of a general of eminent ability and conspicuous valor in the Civil War. His memory is revered. There can be no doubt that she entered upon mission work in Chinatown with the full knowledge of her family and their tacit approval. The men she taught called upon her at her home and were known by name to her people. As the manner of teaching the Chinese is not that of the ordinary classroom, but assigns to each scholar an individual instructor, there is opportunity for far greater intimacy in this branch of work than in ordinary Settlement or missionary endeavor among the poor. A young and romantic girl may entirely misunderstand the character of the man whom she instructs, attributing to him qualities that he does not possess. While in a hundred instances the girl may escape without compromising her feminine dignity, there is always the peril that the hundred and first girl may flutter like the moth to the candle and become the victim of her innocence and inexperience.

The plain truth is that our young girls in this country, now that it has grown cosmopolitan, should be more carefully guarded from contamination and more absolutely shielded from danger than they are.

In her youthful independence and her confidence that all men are her friends, a beautiful young girl resents the implication that she requires protection. Notwithstanding this, a father or brother, or some one else whose relationship is near, should escort the girl who goes out of doors after dark, either in a city or village. In rural communities tragic situations occur from time to time, and the blame cannot always be placed either upon Chinamen or negroes. White men of the baser sort, inflamed by drink, sometimes spring like wild beasts from ambush as girls walk through wayside woods. Let parents and guardians see to it that girlhood is sufficiently protected beyond the doors of the home.

THE WORDS OF THE BELLS

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HAVE we not all had our hearts stirred by the tones of bells ringing clear and sweet upon the air in the quiet morning or in the stilly night? We stood one day on Mount Olivet, close beside the Tower of the Ascension. It was the early morning of Easter Day. The bells in the tower rang suddenly, and it seemed as if the joy of heaven was coming down to flood the souls of men. Some words are like bells, because they have power to call into action the very best that is in us. We will, therefore, call them "bell-words." We have heard such words uttered in the pulpit and on the platform, or we may have read them in books, and ever after the trend of our life was changed. We have repeated such words to our friends; we have written them in a memory-book, and read them over and over again.

There were bell-words in the first letter which the apostle Paul wrote to the Thessalonians. Listen to their pealing:

> Be at peace among yourselves.
> Support the weak.
> Be long suffering toward all.
> Render not any one evil for evil.
> Follow that which is good.
> Rejoice always.
> Pray without ceasing.
> Quench not the Spirit.
> Despise not prophesying (teachings).
> Prove all things.
> Hold fast that which is good.
> Abstain from every form of evil.

"Follow that which is good." Harold was a boy who had been brought up to attend Sunday School and church. When he grew to be about fifteen years old he made the acquaintance of some careless youths, and absented himself from both church and Sunday School. One Sabbath morning, Harold, with some of his companions, had set out to spend the day in sport. They happened to pass the church where he had attended, and just then the bell began to ring. "Come, come, come," it seemed to say. It was like the voice of some one pleading with him to return.

The Spirit of God did plead with him. "Come, come now," the bell pealed, and then stopped. Harold turned to his companions, and said: "I will not go with you to-day; I am going back to church." They laughed and tried to stop him, but they could not. He went in, and sat down in the pew where he had so often sat, but the dear mother and father had long since passed to the heavenly land, and he sat quite alone. The text of the sermon that day was "Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest." The words which the minister spoke seemed so exactly fitted to him that Harold wondered if anybody had been telling the minister about him. At any rate, a great joy came into his heart, and he was ever afterward to be found in his place in the church and became one of its very best helpers.

In all that pertains to our affairs, let us trust in God and do the right. Troubles will disappear as mists before the sun.

"Quench not the Spirit." An old church bell suddenly, when rung, gave out a sound so unlike anything ever heard from it before that all who heard it began to wonder what was the matter. The tone was sharper and shriller than in the days gone by. The people who had been in the habit of listening for its welcome chimes on Sunday morning hardly recognized the strange tone of their bell. It surely could not be that their own old church bell would send out such a piercing summons to the morning service. They had to listen two or three times before they could really make up their minds that the sound came from their own church. Then came the question, "What is the matter with the bell?" The sexton climbed away up in the tower and peered around in the gray shadows, trying vainly to find out the reason for the change in the tune of the bell he had rung for so many years.

Finally, they sent for the firm that made the bell—they must know what was wrong. And the firm sent a man to discover the secret, if possible. He discovered that just a few drops of oil had dripped down when some one had oiled the bearings above, and had settled upon the lower rim of the great bell. That was all, but it proved to be enough to change the tone of the bell. The man wiped the oil away, and the old tone was restored. Similar changes have occurred in human lives. Here is an example: Alice, when she joined the church, was very zealous in the Sunday School and the Christian Endeavor. She was always present, and did more than her share. After a year had passed there came a change, which was noticed by all of her friends. Her Sunday School class was frequently without a teacher. Occasionally she was absent from an Endeavor meeting, until she finally ceased to attend. She became critical, instead of helpful. Her pastor's wife tried to find out the reason for the change. She suspected that evil companionship must have something to do with it. But, upon investigation, she found that Alice had no associates, but she had drawn within herself. The next thing the pastor's wife did was to discover how Alice spent the hours when she was alone. She surmised that she might be reading foolish books, and this was found to be the case. Without any chiding, she set out to interest Alice in noble books. First, she got her to read The Seaboard Parish, by George Macdonald, which had in it the story of a sweet young girl who became an invalid for life by a fall from a horse, and how her invalidism was the means of making the whole family life more tender and Christlike. Book after book of this sort was selected, and Alice was won back to her Christian activity.

"Prove All Things"

"Prove all things, lest we be deceived." As Christians let us not seek counsel of men, but rather of God. "In everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6).

"Despise not prophesyings." When a bell is taken from the mould in which it has been cast, it must be polished in order to give a clear sound. It is literally tuned by the polishing process, its quality being continually tested by the tones of a piano or violin. It has been said, "This process may illustrate the labor God must bestow upon us until our hearts are brought to chord perfectly with the harmonies of heaven." Let us use this to help us understand the meaning of "afflictions" in our lives. Let us try to look upon them as teachers, helping to grow in us the fruits of righteousness. Let us be as willing to be "tuned" as the bell itself!

"Abstain from every form of evil." This is the note of the curfew bell. The practice of ringing the curfew bell may be traced back by centuries. The English term is a corruption of the French couvre feu (cover the fire), and it was a signal for all fires to be put out. William the Conqueror introduced it into England, and the Doctor's Test of Food.

A doctor in Kansas experimented with his boy in a test of food, and gives the particulars. He says:

"I naturally watch the effect of different food on patients. My own little son, a lad of four, had been ill with pneumonia, and during his convalescence did not seem to care for any kind of food.

"I knew something of Grape-Nuts and its rather fascinating flavour, and particularly of its nourishing and nerve-building powers, so I started the boy on Grape-Nuts, and found from the first dish that he liked it.

"His mother gave it to him steadily and he began to improve at once. In less than a month he had gained about eight pounds, and soon became so well and strong we had no further anxiety about him.

"An old patient of mine, 73 years old, came down with a serious stomach trouble, and before I was called had got so weak he could eat almost nothing, and was in a serious condition. He had tried almost every kind of food for the sick without avail.

"I immediately put him on Grape-Nuts with good, rich milk and just a little pinch of sugar. He exclaimed when I came next day, 'Why, doctor, I never ate anything so good or that made me feel so much stronger.'

"I am pleased to say that he got well on Grape-Nuts, but he had to stick to it for two or three weeks, then he began to branch out a little with rice or an egg or two. He got entirely well in spite of his almost hopeless condition. He gained 22 pounds in two months, which, at his age is remarkable.

"I could quote a list of cases where Grape-Nuts has worked wonders."

eople were also requested to re-ain within doors, and penalties were mposed upon those who failed or efused to comply. We are told that n the sixteenth century the night-vatch of London had added to their uties that of ringing a large hand-ell through the streets, and shouting ut with warning voice: "Take care f fire and candle! Be kind to the oor, and pray for the dead."

The Curfew in America

In more than four hundred cities in ur own land the curfew bell is rung, o warn all children unaccompanied by heir parents or guardians to leave the treets and go to their homes. We be-ieve that Mr. Beecher quite under-tood what he was saying when he aid: "Our streets, after dark, are chools of crime." If not only chil-ren, but men and women, would culti-ate the habit of spending their even-ngs at home they would be greatly elped to carry out the injunction: 'Abstain from every form of evil."

St. Anthony is often represented in pictures carrying a bell in his hand, or suspended either to his crutch or to a cross near by. The explanation of it s that he was buffeted of Satan and haunted by demons from blooming outh to the frosty age of one hundred nd five years, and that by means of he bell he exorcised evil spirits.

"Be at peace among yourselves." There is in the tower of old Trinity Church, New York, a wonderful chime of bells, graduated in size, the smallest weighing hardly one hundred pounds. In good old Colonial times they crossed the seas, and it is noted that they were the first chime of bells whose voice was heard this side of the Atlantic. It is said that when these famous bells were cast in London, all the gay nobles and people, realizing that they were to ring the greeting of the Old World to the New, approached the melting-pot, wherein the bells lay simmering and bubbling, and cast in their golden chains and ornaments with many a broad piece of silver or golden doubloon wrested from the Spanish buccaneers in strange seas, and to this gift of love, and the spirit which prompted it, the bells owe, they say, their sweet and harmonious tones. They are not the same bells as then, for they have been remelted and recast, but the old metal is still there. This story should certainly help us to listen at Christmas time, and at all times to count more dearly the message of "peace on earth."

"Support the weak."

The bells themselves are the best preachers;
Their brazen lips are learned teachers.
From their pulpits of stone in the upper air,
Sounding aloft without crack or flaw
Shriller than trumpets under the Law,
Now a sermon, now a prayer.

LONGFELLOW.

Paul's Teaching at Thessalonica

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Church of Thessalonica was the youngest of all those to whom Paul's epistles were written. It could not have been many months in existence when he thus wrote to these converts, the fruit of only three Sabbaths' ministry in the Jewish synagogue, and whatever time he might have been able to spare in the week-days from his travail night and day, that he might not burden any of them.

The genuine stamp of the Holy Ghost was upon these newly-born Christians; they knew they were saved and what they were saved for; to live no longer unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again. And their testimony was so used of God that the Word spread throughout Macedonia and Achaia, and their converts reported about them that they had "turned unto God from idols to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." They were no hospital Christians, to be nursed and cared for by spiritual fathers and mothers; but were strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; a pattern church unto this day! They did not fight shy of suffering. Their spiritual father, Paul, was shown, when he was converted, how many things he must suffer for Christ's sake, and he did not hide from his converts that following Christ must always be at a cost.

Paul had instructed them, not only in what the life of a Christian should be, and might be by the power of the Holy Ghost, but he also instructed them of the coming again of the Lord Jesus, so that they lived in constant expectation. Then another question arose: Was His coming near? Could Paul give them any dates? And he writes: "Concerning the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that aught be written unto you." Why? For what is our Lord waiting? Can it be for anything else than the bringing together in him of those members who have been made partakers of the divine nature, mystery never made known in the Old Testament, as these passages tell us, but which give the clue to our Lord's tarrying?

Testimonials From Prominent Men on the Illustrated History of All Nations

FOR the further information of our readers who are interested in our unprecedented History Offer — The Illustrated History of All Nations — we give the following testimonial letters from prominent men concerning this magnificent work:

Adlai E. Stevenson, Ex-Vice-President of the United States, says:

The Library of Universal History is indeed a complete record of the human race. It should find a place in every library.

Wallace Radcliffe, D.D., Pastor Presbyterian Church, Washington, D.C., writes:

The progress of civilization is well indicated throughout the volumes, and the main features admirably grouped in the closing of some of the volumes. The history is brought down to the most prominent events and figures of the present year. The tone is healthful, patriotic and in religious mention true and reverential. The style is compact, clear and graphic. The illustrations are superb. The maps deserve special mention.

Rev. W. C. Bitting, D.D., Pastor Baptist Church, New York, says:

The Library of Universal History amply justifies its title. The fascinating story of mankind's beginnings and developments moves before us like a charming panorama, beautifully illustrated by surprisingly illuminating pictures. The attention paid to life invests the story with the interest of a novel, while the well-written narrative of fact becomes more absorbing than any creation of the imagination. The illustrations illustrate; many of them are rare. The historical maps so necessary to the understanding of a nation's career show the fluctuations of territory at a glance. They are more abundant than in any similar work with which I am acquainted. Every home would be richer with this work, no matter how many histories may supplement it. Every parent should put it within the reach of his children.

They'll All Be Glad

When you show your folks a dozen cans of Van Camp's, and say "No more home baking; no more soggy, broken beans," every face will smile.

For home-baked beans are hard to digest. They ferment and form gas. They are mushy and broken.

Van Camp's are digestible; they don't form gas, and they are nutty, mealy and whole.

And the tomato sauce is baked into Van Camp's, so it forms a delicious blend.

The reason lies in our ovens.

We bake in live steam, so the beans are uncrisped and unbroken.

We heat these ovens to 245 degrees. Then we bake in small parcels, so every bean gets the full heat.

In the home baking dish, four-fifths of the beans get only 100 degrees.

Heat alone can break up the granules so the digestive juices can act. And you can't, in a dry oven, apply half enough heat.

Beans are our choicest, cheapest food. They are 84 per cent nutriment.

The choicest beef, costing three times as much, has even a lesser food value.

It pays to have them right — to have them digestible — to have them likable.

And those dozen cans mean a dozen meals, ready whenever you want them.

You'll be glad as the rest are when you once change to Van Camp's.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

Any steam-baked beans are better than home-baked — better because they digest. But to get the delicious beans you must get Van Camp's.

To get the choicest Michigan beans, picked over by hand, we pay four times what some beans cost.

To make our sauce from vine-ripened tomatoes, we spend five times what some sauce costs.

The difference shows immensely in nuttiness, mealiness and zest. As a result Van Camp's far outsell all other brands, together.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

The Utmost In 6% Bonds

Irrigation Bonds, when properly issued, form ideal investments. No other large class of bonds, based on equal security, pays six per cent.

Irrigation Bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The loan will not average one-fourth the land's value.

They are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all that the Irrigation Company owns. Some are municipal obligations—in each case a tax lien on all the property in the district.

Where else can one find such ideal security behind bonds that net six per cent?

These are serial bonds, so one may make short-time or long-time investments. And every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations as low as $100, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

We are the largest dealers in Reclamation Bonds. During the past fifteen years, we have sold seventy such issues. Not a dollar of loss has resulted to any investor.

We have written a book based on all this experience—the best book of the kind ever published. Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. Everyone in these days should know Irrigation Bonds. The book is free. Please send this coupon to-day for it.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXIV

GETTING AT THE "CORE"

THE new model came three times a week to the studio. The acquaintance was progressing slowly, but surely—too slowly, however, for Preston's entire satisfaction. He had looked for it to go forward by leaps and bounds after that illuminating scene before the picture on that first day; and great was his disappointment to find that Marco kept himself most of the time fast locked in a reserve that admitted scant chance for intimacy.

So eager was the young artist to gain the boy's confidence, that sometimes he went too far, and had to beat a hasty retreat which would yet cover the real purpose of the attack.

The boy was a puzzle to him. To Dr. Fernald, Preston owned that he had never known such a mixture of good and evil, of traits lovable and unlovable, of honesty and dishonesty. The heart was there—Preston had not forgotten that first day in the studio—but it seemed hopelessly incased in an armor that defied the most carefully pointed darts; and the Big Brother was at times almost ready to give up in despair.

The boy was very punctual at the studio. He frankly liked the work—and the pay for it. He admired the pictures, and spent long, absorbed minutes before the great landscape across the room; but never again did any of them stir him out of himself as on that first day.

In his ideas on money matters, the boy was, perhaps, the greatest enigma to Preston. Charity, he refused outright. He was honesty itself when it came to paying his just debts—but he reveled in craps and marbles, and dice-throwing for money, at every opportunity; and the rights of property-holders were respected by him only to the extent of his inability to get possession of any object he desired. He scrupulously paid to Preston the five cents he had borrowed for car-fare—and that same day a dollar bill disappeared from the studio, obviously by no other hand than his.

When Preston, somewhat at a loss how to proceed, questioned the boy as to his opinion of pilfering in general, he rendered a reply that disconcerted his benefactor not a little.

"It seems ter me," the boy explained, "that what's layin' round loose belongs ter any one what is smart enough ter git it first. 'Course, what ye owe an' promise ter pay, is diff'rent; that ain't yourn—you've give it away already. But when it comes ter other stuff, why, that belongs ter whoever gits it first, an' is smart enough ter keep it. Besides, there's dad; 'tain't often that jest what money I earn'll take care o' him, an' I has ter take what I can git. 'Course, dad's got ter be looked out for!"

Preston knew then that the secret of the scrap-iron stealing was his—and he knew something else too: he knew that the task Dr. Fernald had given him to do was even harder than either of them had thought it to be.

Very cautiously Preston set to work to change the boy's method of reasoning. Bit by bit he endeavored to give him new standards of right and wrong. Through it all he tried to be just and gentle and patient. He remembered the boy's life and his surroundings, and his struggle for very existence. But he wondered, sometimes, as the days passed, if he were accomplishing much, after all.

There was one thing, however, that he had accomplished. February was nearly gone now, and Preston had won the boy's promise to go into school the first of March, when the picture would be finished. Even this would not have been possible, however, but for the fact of one other victory; and this victory, Preston sometimes thought, was the most signal of all: "dad" was going away.

For some weeks now John Covino had been at home, half drunk, half crazy, wholly ill—a very terror to the boy, who did not swerve for one moment from the most devoted attendance. Preston had for some time had in mind an institution that he knew of, halfway between a sanatorium and a reformatory, where Covino could be well cared for, and where he might possibly regain health and strength. Preston had told the boy of this place, and had glowingly set forth its advantages, using every argument in his power to gain the boy's approval. Just how he had finally won it, however, he did not himself understand until Marco, in his own words, explained it.

"Ye see, it ain't as if I was leavin' dad. I wouldn't do that, 'course, an' you know it. But it's dad what's leavin' me. An' that's all right, 'cause he'll be better off, an' be took care of, an' git well an' strong. An' 'tain't charity, neither, exactly, 'cause you say dad can work himself when he's well enough, an' pay his way. 'Course, ye know, dad an' me wouldn't want no charity!" And so the matter was settled, much to Preston's relief and delight.

The young artist's friends laughed sometimes over his absorption in his new work, but he only smiled in return. He was not ready to talk. Mrs. Preston sighed and shook her head over his "infatuation," and sometimes she pleaded with him. To her, Preston spoke earnestly, at times, of his hopes and plans—though not often. On one thing, however, they were agreed: Florence must not see the boy. He was certainly not a fit companion for her—yet. And as Florence was in school and had her own interests, and as the studio was quite apart from the rest of the house, this exclusion of intercourse was easily accomplished.

A Poisonous Drug Still Freely Used.

Many people are brought up to believe that coffee is a necessity of life, and the strong hold that the drug has on the system makes it hard to loosen its grip even when one realizes its injurious effects.

A lady in Baraboo writes: "I had used coffee for years; it seemed one of the necessities of life. A few months ago my health, which had been slowly failing, became more impaired, and I knew that unless relief came from some source, I would soon be a physical wreck.

"I was weak and nervous, had sick headaches, no ambition, and felt tired of life. My husband was also losing his health. He was troubled so much with indigestion that at times he could eat only a few mouthfuls of dry bread.

"We concluded that coffee was slowly poisoning us, and stopped it and used hot water. We felt somewhat better, but it wasn't satisfactory.

"Finally, we saw Postum advertised, and bought a package. I followed directions for making carefully, allowing it to boil twenty minutes after it came to the boiling point, and added cream, which turned it to the loveliest rich-looking and tasting drink I ever saw served at any table, and we have used Postum ever since.

"I gained five pounds in weight in as many weeks, and now feel well and strong in every respect. My headaches have gone, and I am a new woman. My husband's indigestion has left him, and he can now eat anything." "There's a Reason."

In March John Covino went away, and Marco began school again. He lived now with a family whom Preston had found, and who were glad to board the boy in return for light work that he could do out of school hours. He came to the studio now only on Saturday mornings; but Preston still saw him often during the week. The young man understood that it must not be all elimination in the case of this undisciplined brother of his—it must be equally culture. When he strove to take away an interest that was evil, he must have ready to replace it one that was good; and to that end he loaned the boy books and magazines, introduced him into a good gymnasium, took him to vesper service once or twice, and finally induced him to join a boy's club, at the head of which was Dr. Fernald himself.

It was in March, on a particularly warm Saturday, that he invited Marco to go for a ride in his motor-car, and to both of them that ride was a revelation.

On this occasion Preston was his own chauffeur, and, as he expected, every throb of the engine and every turn of the wheel were of entrancing interest to the boy at his side; but all this lost its attraction when the wide sweep of open country was reached.

They were far up on a beautiful river road. The green of the hills and of the trees was only a promise of what it would be; but the sun shone, the water rippled and glistened, and the broad blue sky was over all. To Marco's face came a glorified light that made Preston silent with amazement. Instinctively he lessened his speed, and brought the car almost to a stop. In the boy's eyes he had discovered the look that he had seen there once before, and that he had so longed to see again—the look that had been in them on that first day in the studio.

"Jiminy, Mr. Preston, ain't it goin' ter be great out here by an' by?" murmured the boy. "An' ain't it great now?"

"It certainly is, Marco."

"Back there, sometimes, I 'most furgit there is such places," continued the boy, dreamily; "an' then I remember Mont-Lawn, an' I know there is."

"Mont-Lawn?"

"Yes. It's a place up the river where they take kids an' give 'em ten days in the country. They let ye sing an' stay outdoors all day; an' they tell ye about—about God an' flags, an'—an' bein' red, white, an' blue, ye know. An' 'tain't hard ter be that, neither, when you've got all this 'round ye—trees, an' grass, an' sky. Why, seems ter me, sometimes, if I had it—like this, ye know—I could be red, white, an' blue to—to ev'rybody!"

Preston's heart leaped, and his eyes grew misty; but he only said, in a carefully matter-of-fact voice:

"I'm going camping, Marco, in June, and I'm thinking maybe I'll take you along with me, if you'd like to go. It'll be all grass, and trees, and sky there. Will you go?"

"Will I?"

And in the boy's ecstatic sigh of content, the man was answered.

CHAPTER XXV

THE LITTLE BROTHER AND A VIOLIN

MARCO was spending Saturday afternoon at the studio, just a week after the automobile ride. A new picture was being planned, and Preston was posing his model in different positions, when his mother came hurriedly into the room.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," she murmured hastily. "I thought you had finished—it is so late."

"We had practically finished. We were just talking. What is it, mother? You look disturbed."

"I am disturbed — seriously. Morenski has just sent word that he can't come to-night."

"Then we'll have to do without him, I suppose," smiled the man.

Mrs. Preston lifted her head impatiently.

"But, Howard, don't you see? There are my guests—and he was my bright particular star for the evening. The rest are all well enough so far as they go, but alone they'd make a slim programme for such a musicale as people expect this to be. It was cruel of Morenski to treat me like this, and to spoil things so! And there are the duchess and all her party—and you know how she adores the violin!"

"But isn't there some one else? Surely, in all New York there ought to be some fiddler you could get!"

Mrs. Preston gave her son a scornful glance.

"'Fiddler'! That's just about what I'd get," she retorted mournfully, "at this late day, and so late in the season, too! But I did try. I've telephoned everywhere. I even tried to get another instrument. I don't want a singer; I have enough of those. But I couldn't get a thing—that I'd take, of course. Howard, what shall I do?"

Preston started to speak, but to his surprise Marco stepped eagerly forward.

"Was it some one ter play the fiddle that ye wanted?" he questioned.

"Why, y-yes." Mrs. Preston was too amazed to say more.

"Well, that's all right then. I can do that for ye."

"You—can—do—that—for me!" In her stupefaction Mrs. Preston could scarcely articulate the words. But in a moment she found her temper and her voice, both at once. "Do you mean to say, boy, that you would come before my guests to-night and play—for me?" she demanded.

"Sure I would," returned Marco, promptly, entirely misconstruing her meaning. "I'd do that an' more for ye. Mr. Preston here has been mighty good ter me, an' there ain't anythin' I wouldn't do for him an' you!"

Called Higher

Mortimer Blake Mason, a prominent business man of Boston, Mass., senior member of S. D. Warren & Co., died February 6.

Stephen Becker, of Albany, N. Y., died recently, at the age of ninety-two years. He was a member of the Dutch Reformed Church at Castleton.

Mrs. M. A. Furman, of Swanton, Vt., entered into rest a few months ago, at the age of eighty years. She was a member of the Congregational Church.

Called higher, Miss Eliza Root, of Evans Mills, N. Y., after a life of Christian usefulness. She had been a subscriber to this paper for over twenty years.

Thomas Whitaker, of Sherlcy, Mass., died recently. He was born in Great Oldham, England, in 1827. He exemplified the highest type of a Christian gentleman.

Mrs. Mary B. Turvin, of Sapulpa, Okla., was called home May 14, 1909. She was a member of the Methodist Church and a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for at least twenty years.

At the Harding homestead, Bethany, N. Y., Miss Marcia Jane Harding entered into rest a short time ago. She was born in the house she died in, and for fifty-eight years was a member of the Bethany Baptist Church.

On the evening of July 4 there passed away in Dayton, O., Henry Clay Lowe, who for many years had been one of the city's most progressive and esteemed men of business. He was sixty-one years of age and a member of the firm of Lowe Brothers' Company, which was formed in September, 1872. Mr. Lowe, while actively engaged in the affairs of his firm, was also a leader in the religious life of the community in which he lived. His advice was constantly sought by those interested in church work and philanthropic causes throughout the State of Ohio, and both advice and aid cheerfully given. In brief, he was an example of the Christian business man, and his success was as well earned as it was marked.

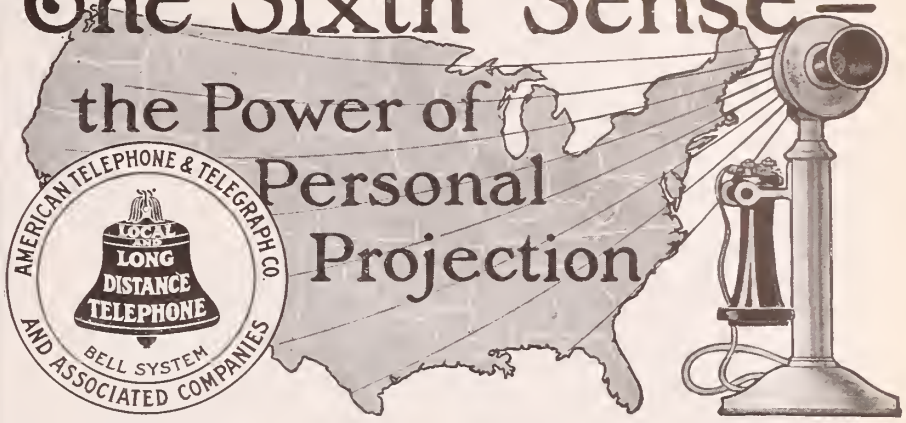
The Sixth Sense—the Power of Personal Projection



An American's sense of projecting himself far beyond the skies and hills of his forefathers is largely responsible for his self-assurance—for his mental vigor and the progress which this has meant.

The Sixth Sense—the sense of projection—is due to the telephone. It is due to the Bell telephone system which at any instant conveys his personality, if not his person, to any part of the country. It carries his voice with directness to the ear of the person wanted. Carries it with its tone qualities and inflections—things which are vital to the expression of personality.

Bell telephone service is more than a mere carrier of messages. It is a system of sensitive wire nerves, carrying the perception-message to the nerve centre and the return message simultaneously. It is the only means of communication which thus carries the message and the answer instantly. While you are projecting your personality—the strength of your individuality, to the distant point, the party at the other end is projecting his personality, at the same instant and by the same means, to you.

You are virtually in two places at once.

Though this service is in a class by itself, the Bell telephone has no fight with the other public utilities. Its usefulness is dove-tailed into all other utilities. Each of the others is unquestionably made more effective by the Bell telephone.

A telegram is delivered from receiving office to house by telephone. The more people telegraph, the more they telephone. The more people travel, the more they telephone. The more energetically a man pursues business of any kind, the more he needs and uses the telephone.

The universal Bell telephone gives every other utility an added usefulness. It provides the Nation with its Sixth Sense.

A business man has one important arm of his business paralyzed if he does not have a Long Distance Telephone at his elbow. It extends his personality to its fullest limitations—applies the multiplication table to his business possibilities. It keeps things moving.

Raising Buster Boys

You can raise bread with yeast, but you can't raise boys that way. The hungriest boy on earth is the growing boy at ten. His body demands building material that will make good bone, brain and muscle. The best food for the growing boy or girl is because it contains all the material for building sturdy, robust bodies. The crispness of the shreds promotes mastication, which means sound teeth and good digestion. A food to study on, to play on—for children and grown-ups.

The Ideal Summer food because it supplies the greatest amount of muscle-building material with the least tax upon the digestive organs.

It is the whole wheat cleaned, steam-cooked, shredded and baked in a two-million dollar bakery — the cleanest, finest, most hygienic food factory in the world.

Two Shredded Wheat Biscuits (heated in the oven to restore crispness) eaten with a little milk or cream and a little salt to suit the taste, will supply all the energy needed for a half day's work. A little fruit adds to their wholesomeness and their nutritive value. Our new illustrated cook book is sent free for the asking.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

E. B., Richland, Mo. 1. Does the Bible not teach that the only true and lasting happiness is from God, and that man's happiness is in God's favor? 2. Do not writers and lecturers on mental culture universally recognize the necessity of divine aid in developing this mind power?

1. Yes, in numerous passages. 2. Some do and some do not. Those who speak from a Christian standpoint regard all talent as a gift from God, and to be used accordingly; but they do not overlook the necessity of human effort for its cultivation.

M. A., Sacramento, Calif. Was George Meredith, the poet and novelist, who died recently, a Christian?

One of his biographers, the Rev. Robertson Nicoll, says he was not. He was rather an agnostic. He did not believe in any vital Christian doctrine, though he was a profound moralist and had a kindly human heart. The doctrine of the soul's immortality he rejected altogether, declaring it "inconceivable."

G. S., Kankakee, Ill. 1. When was the Anglican, or Church of England, organized? 2. What church did the organizers of the Anglican Church spring from? 3. Has the Anglican Church any grounds for claiming apostolic succession?

1. It dates from the consecration of Matthew Parker as Arehbishop of Canterbury, on December 17, 1559. Queen Elizabeth had issued two mandates commanding such consecration and claiming to be the supreme head of the Church of England, and in the "Act of Supremacy" the Parliament fully supported such claim. 2. From the Roman Catholic Church. The High Church claims an anterior origin, derived from the Welsh and British bishops, who were in England before the landing of the Roman Catholic, Augustine, in Canterbury in 596. This claim, however, is not considered sufficiently maintained. 3. None, except the presbyterial succession of other reformed churches. The whole question rests on the consecration of Matthew Parker. The English church was under the dominion of Rome until Henry VIII. took on himself sole jurisdiction as supreme head of the church. Under Edward VI., the church was decidedly Protestant. Mary, Edward's successor, restored the Catholic dominion, and at the time of Elizabeth's succession every episcopal see was filled by Catholic bishops.

W. P. George, D.D.

H. J. B., Olds, Pa. 1. What and where is Monte Carlo? 2. Where did the saying, "According to Hoyle," originate?

1. Monte Carlo is the capital of the little principality of Monaco, off the southeast coast of France, near Italy. It is ruled by a prince. It has long been famous for the gambling carried on in its casino. 2. Hoyle was a famous maker of rules for games, hence the expression when one wishes to say a thing is correct.

Reader, Akron, O. If the Decalogue is in force to-day, as many teachers and preachers hold, how is it to be interpreted in the light of Christianity? In what sense did Jesus come to fulfil the law?

The two questions are one. The ancient law of Moses, as Jesus pointed out, dealt with the visible offense against our fellow-men. The Gospel discloses the invisible offense, the secret sin of the heart, imperceptible to human eyes and unpunishable by human laws, but in God's sight equally heinous with the other. Only in the last command in the Decalogue are the sins of the heart referred to. It was but a faint hint of that spiritual teaching against inward sin, which Jesus afterward taught so fully. And he crowned the new revelation with his law of love for God and man, and with the Gospel of grace, which frees us from moral bondage to the old law. See Rom. 6:14, and related passages.

Mrs. J. S., Brockville, Ontario, Canada, writes, apropos of a recent Mail-Bag paragraph regarding the whereabouts of the Ark of the covenant: "If we read in II. Maccabees, 2:4-8, we will find that Jeremiah (4) 'being warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the Ark to go with him as he went forth into the mountain, where Moses climbed up and saw the heritage of God. (5) And when Jeremiah came thither he found a hollow cave, wherein he laid the tabernacle and the Ark and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door. (7) He said, As for that place it shall be unknown until the time that God gathers his people again together. . . . (8) Then shall the Lord show them these things.'"

D. W. S., Lorain, O. Please explain the difference between a consul, a minister and an ambassador. Also, duties, salaries, etc., and how one may attain to each.

A consul is the representative of our national commercial interests in some foreign city. He reports on conditions of markets and ways of introducing American products, and also, to a certain extent, looks after the interests of Americans residing in his district. A minister is a diplomatic representative of our national government accredited to some foreign country. He transacts any international business we may have with the Secretary of State of the government to which he is sent, and acts in case of disputes between our citizens who may have beocme involved in some way with the foreign government. An ambassadorship is the highest diplomatic position. An ambassador may transact international business with the ruler of a foreign country personally, as he represents the sovereign power, ruler or people. Consuls are chosen by a competitive examination at the State Department, Washington, appointed to the lowest grade and promoted as openings occur. Ministers and ambassadors are usually distinguished citizens of the United States, whom it is desired in some way to reward. Some ministers are promoted from the ranks of legation secretaries, and some of these are now chosen by examination. It is impossible for any but wealthy men to hold the position of ambassador, as the salaries do not more than cover the house rent they are obliged to pay to keep up the position in foreign cities.

Galveston's Sea Wall, which Saved the City in the Recent Hurricane

GALVESTON, Texas, was almost destroyed by flood and storm, September 8, 1900, when the waters of the Gulf of Mexico inundated the city, causing a loss of 6,000 lives and $20,000,000 in property. Then, as a precaution and defense, a great sea wall was built, one and a half miles in length, seventeen feet in height and of ponderous thickness. On July 21 last, a hurricane swept over the island, inundating the low-lying sections, causing a loss of sixteen lives on a fishing pier, and some damage to property there; but though the storm was the worst in nine years, and the water was several feet deep in the lower streets and in the cellars, the sea wall remained intact, and not a single life was lost in the city. This wall, which cost $1,500,000, is now generally acknowledged by the citizens as the means of averting a great disaster.

D. B. J., Paterson, N. J. Are we to understand from the Gospels that Christ intended his servants to attempt the conversion of governments and nations, or of individuals?

Not of governments and nations, as such, for Jesus contemplated no attempt to grasp earthly power. See his answer to Pilate, John 18:36. His kingdom is in the hearts of men. So, whenever the Church of Christ endeavors to seize temporal power, or to "pull wires" to control the State, it goes wide of its mission and is on the high-road to spiritual deterioration. This is why the people of those countries in which church and State are united have suffered so long and deeply from bitter persecution, and why some of them are still suffering to-day. The Gospel teaches the law of religious liberty. It is one of the chief glories of our own land that there is freedom of worship and freedom of conscience, and that here no State church exists to limit these precious privileges, which have been ours since this government was founded.

G. P. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. 1. Explain Matt. 12:36. 2. Also Ezek. 33:15, 16. If any one becomes dissatisfied with his church, should he join another?

1. It means that our thoughts and our speech, as the index of our hearts, will be taken into account, in judgment, in the estimate of our characters. 2. If a wicked man truly repents, asks forgiveness and makes restitution, he will find God ready to pardon. The last two clauses of verse 16 refer to his repentance and restitution. 3. The choice of your church home is one to be made carefully and conscientiously. Don't change through whim or pique. You may be able to do better service there and to get more spiritual benefit, despite all drawbacks, than anywhere else.

W. S., Newark, O. 1. Are vicar, curate and rector synonymous with each other, and with minister, parson, pastor and preacher? 2. Was King Edward VII. married more than once? 3. Are not the subjects of Great Britain, in all but name, "free born"? 4. Are the lords always required to attend the sessions of Parliament? 5. Are Richard Harding Davis and Rebecca Harding Davis related?

1. No; parson, preacher and pastor are used often too indiscriminately to designate a minister. The distinction is that a pastor has a settled charge; a preacher may be a traveling evangelist. Vicar, curate and rector designate distinct positions in the Episcopal Church. A rector is the head of a church and parish, the curate is his assistant and always a clergyman. A vicar is a minister of the English Church, who has charge of a parish, but performs the work for some one else and receives but part of the stipend. 2. No; King Edward has only been married once. His wife, Princess Alexandra of Denmark, is the present Queen of England. 3. The British people, in many respects, are the freest people on earth, but they take great pride in the name of British subject. 4. No; the lords are not compelled to attend sessions. They come when their party leaders deem their presence necessary; there are always enough present to transact business. 5. Rebecca Harding Davis is the mother of Richard Harding Davis.

J. S. A., Washington, O. What became of the automobile that left New York for France a year or two ago?

The American car you refer to made the trip successfully, and was followed by one or two others. It went by way of Siberia, and reached Paris in fair condition, a triumph for American automobile construction.

E. M. B., Keene, N. H. No, the early Christians were not Roman Catholics. The Roman Church did not lay claim to supremacy until about 150 A.D. The first established Christian Church, outside of the little company at Jerusalem, was probably that at Antioch in Syria, which was the scene of Paul's first missionary efforts and from which he set forth on his historic journeys.

E. P. B., Graettinger, Ia. 1. Of what denominations are the leading rulers in Europe? 2. Does a princess who marries some prince or king have to adopt his creed and method of worship?

1. The rulers of a country must belong to the state church. The kings of Spain, Italy, Portugal and Belgium and the emperor of Austria are Roman Catholics. The king of England is the head of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The emperor of Germany is a Lutheran, as are some of the subordinate kings of Germany; the queen of Holland and the kings of Denmark, Sweden and Norway belong to branches of the Protestant faith; the emperor of Russia and the king of Greece belong to the Greek Church. 2. Almost without exception the princess who becomes the wife of a ruler adopts his religion.

W. McD., Livermore, Calif. Is there, or has there ever been, any doubt as to Moses being the author of the Ten Commandments?

The authorship of the first five books of the Old Testament (including, of course, the commandments) has been a subject of much controversy. Jews call the whole collection "the Law of Moses," and ascribe the whole work to him. Many of the ablest modern authorities have written in support of the Mosaic authorship. It is regarded as probable that another hand than Moses' own finished the Pentateuch. See Deut. 31:24-30.

TREKKING THROUGH THE AFRICAN WILDS

By ROBERT WODEHOUSE

Umtali, Rhodesia

SOME time ago I felt led to take a pioneer journey into a new African region. So, with Mrs. Wodehouse and others, we started on a journey of nearly five hundred miles, camping in our little tents at night. Our camp was made secure from the wild beasts, lions, hyenas, tigers, etc., by cutting down trees and piling them around us; large fires were kept burning all through the night to frighten the animals away. We met with various incidents: one night four lions were roaring round us till the break of day, but our heavenly Father threw his protecting care around us, so that no one was hurt; another night our boys heard something just outside the enclosure and, filled with panic, began to scream and run toward our tents, crying, "Shumba! Shumba!" (Lion! Lion!)

Victoria is very beautiful in some parts, and in others sublimely grand. To this country we had come, not for our own pleasure, not in search of diamonds and gold, but on the Master's business—to search for souls, to bring the glad tidings of salvation to a dark and benighted people—to look for sites where we might plant mission stations and thus extend the work in connection with our own church and advance the interests of God's kingdom. We were in search of kraals and people. There was great curiosity, for no missionary had ever been seen in this part of the country and they had never heard the Gospel; the name of Jesus was a new name to them. Mrs. Wodehouse was a continual source of interest and curiosity; the women and children would crowd round and express their wonder that she was white; some would come near enough to touch her hand to see if the color were real or would rub off; they would examine her hair, etc., keeping up a running comment and exploding now and then with laughter. Our cooking and food arrangements were a source of great amusement. Sometimes, when we approached a kraal unawares, the little children would run away with fright in all directions, crying, "Yowe mbuya! Yowe mbuya!" (O grandmother!)

We visited many chiefs and indunas, and stayed for a few days at some of their kraals, holding services at night around a big camp-fire, for the people are busy during the day in their fields. In this way some Gospel seed was sown, and who knows what the harvest of this wayside sowing will be? Many open doors presented themselves to us, and some of them, by God's help, we are entering.

The Ndanga District alone has some 70,000 people without a single missionary; this is open to us, and we could place six missionaries here easily. Then at Gutu's there are 30,000 people; we need two or three workers for this place. So that there are 100,000 people without a missionary, waiting for us.

In the year 1902 the first pioneer missionary trip was taken in the district where we now have the flourishing Mutambara Industrial Mission. Accompanied by my daughter, Mrs. Carson, we passed over mountains and through forests and rivers, camping out at night under some big tree or huge rock. Occasionally we occupied a Kafir hut, which is usually full of vermin. The ants come up out of the ground underneath us in myriads, and the rats and roaches from the roof above us. We visited several kings, preaching the Word at every kraal, and were well received. God put his seal upon that first trip; it was the beginning of many which have been taken since.

We visited the Chief Mutambara at that time, who received us within his circular kraal most graciously. He put one of the royal huts at our disposal, welcomed us to his reserve, and asked that a missionary might be sent to his people. For several years evangelistic trips have been taken to this place, but not until last year were we able to secure ground. We have now a beautiful farm, and in the vicinity there are thousands of natives, giving great opportunity for a splendid work.

Six months ago, Rev. A. L. Buchwalter and his devoted wife were available for this great field. They reached Mutambara's on the 9th of April of this year. The ox team, which brought them to a welcoming tree, unloaded all into the tall grass which grows so luxuriously in Rhodesia, and trekked away. After morning coffee, all began to make camp. Soon the tent was up, the canvas stretched over the goods, and the kitchen established under a tree. Some days later a grass shack was built, which was used for weeks as a dining-room and a drawing-room, also a sleeping place for one of the party. Later a site for the temporary house was chosen. Poles were brought from the bush and grass was cut to build a larger bungalow, sixty feet long, with wide veranda. The floors are of clay, beaten hard in the native way. The only imported articles used in the building are the small windows, the doors and nails. When the grass bungalow was finished, a church, also used as a schoolroom, was built in the same way, and the missionaries were settled until the friends at home help us to build permanently.

Sick Natives Waiting to Be Treated by the Missionary Doctor

It is our purpose to cultivate broom corn, wheat, oats, rice and other cereals. Already we have all the machinery for making brooms; the broom corn grows as well as in the States. We have put in nearly 2,000 cuttings of the basket willow, as it is our purpose to develop the industry of basket-making, at which the native is an adept.

Some time ago we visited Maranki's Reserve and obtained the consent of the king to open a mission in his land. The site chosen was on the side of Mount Makomwe, near the king's kraal, forty miles from the nearest white settlement and midway between the Sabi and Odzi Rivers. Here was a heathen people, almost strangers to the visits of the white man. The people were nearly naked, and very dirty. They oiled their bodies more than they washed them. They drank beer; they sang meaningless heathen songs and played only as drunken heathen can play. Their huts were so low that they were obliged to crawl into them on hands and knees. They did not want our learning or religion. They were afraid of the white man who had come to live among them. Here a mission house was built and the work begun.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

THE LIGHT OF LIFE

TEXTS:
Gen. 1:3; John 8:12; Matt. 5:14

THERE is an old church in England. It stands out in the country by itself, and was built seven centuries ago. It contains the remains of a very old box gallery, which is quite rare. The ends of the pews are of black oak, and instead of being numbered they are lettered. On each panel is some rudely carved scene from the life of Christ. There are some rare old brasses in the flagging of this church, and in one corner off from the choir there is a little room which was once used for a boys' school. On a slab of stone, which was evidently used as a desk, are carved the names of a dozen different boys, and among them one can read the name of a boy and the date 1621. That is the time the Pilgrim Fathers were landing at Plymouth, and about then this lad in an idle moment, when the teacher was not looking, was carving his initials and the year in this old church.

Glass Nearly 800 Years Old

These things all looked old to the visitor from the new country. Finally he inquired if there was any old glass in the church, and the one who was showing him the building took him into an alcove and pointed out a small fragment of old glass, the only bit that was left. The visitor looked at this bit of glass and tried to remember that it was 796 years old. Just then the sun came out, and a ray of light came down through the window and through this old piece of glass, striking on the worn stone in the chancel and covering the gray stone with rainbow color, and then the visitor was reminded of the fact that while the old glass might be very old, measured by our human reckoning of time, the light which was coming through the window was infinitely older. One of the commonest things we know anything about—the first thing noticed in the morning, the thing which makes possible the busy work of men, the thing we have never been without—is the oldest thing of which we know anything. The first recorded words of God are these: "Let there be light." There was something before light, but nothing is said about it except that it was void, and darkness was on the face of the deep. The first thing to which a name was given was "light."

There are some very interesting things about this oldest thing of creation. The first thing is that light is always clean. It can go into the foulest places and cannot possibly be contaminated. There is no other thing in all the universe that cannot be fouled. The whitest marble can be blackened; the finest things that men make may be disfigured. If we sat in this building long enough, with the doors and windows closed, the air would soon become tainted and unbreathable. Water can easily be fouled. But no one can ever, by any possibility, do anything to tarnish, or disfigure, or foul light. It is in the nature of the case, so it seems, absolutely and infinitely clean.

In the second place, this mysterious thing called light, the oldest thing known to man, moves with greater rapidity than anything we know. Even wireless telegraphy limps on lame feet in contrast with light.

Wonderful Speed of Light

The latest and best authenticated calculation of the speed of light is 186,600 miles a second. This means that if the light in New York harbor, on the Statue of Liberty, were gifted with the ability to travel in circles instead of straight lines, it could go clear around the world seven times in one second. It means that if one struck a match and wanted to go to New York and back before the match was burned out, if he traveled with the speed of the light from the match, he would have to go 125 times in one tick of the clock. Practically this means the annihilation of space; and if, as seems to be proved scientifically, what we call light moves along transmitted waves of what we call, for want of a better name, ether, it adds to the wonderful mystery of the rapidity.

In the third place, this wonderful thing called light can eliminate any degree of darkness. In fact, the greater degree of darkness, the greater the contrast by the light.

In the fourth place, this oldest thing in creation is the same always. This is not true of other of nature's forces. Climate often changes under certain conditions. Soil can be changed by the application of outside chemical forces. The air varies under certain pressure or temperature. Water is changed owing to the cultivation of adjacent land, or the opening up of new territory, but light is the same now as when God first said, "Let there be light"; eternally the same, unchangeable and unchanging.

The significance of Christ's statement, "I am the light of the world," may be helped a little by what we have already said, but in reality there are two things which stand out more prominently than any others in the blaze of this brightness. The first I believe to be the assertion of His divinity. What man could ever say to the universe, "I am the light of the universe"? Aside from the record of the miracles, aside from the unrivaled character of his teaching, aside from his sinlessness, these seven words of Christ reveal his consciousness of his more than human power.

The second significance of this statement is the revelation of universal redemption. "I am the light of the world." Here was a Jew stepping outside of the narrow national circle. At one bound He becomes a world figure, removed by ages from the narrow, limited conception which the Jew had of humankind.

The World's Darkness

There are different kinds of darkness which this Light has come into the world to dispel. First, there is the darkness of ignorance. This may be of two kinds, innocent and wilful. God has not left any human being without a witness, but the light is dim in the countries where Christ is not known, and the people in what we call heathen lands will be judged according to their knowledge of the poor light. Ignorance, however, which sins against the great light wilfully is of another type. It is this darkness especially that the light of Christ has come to dispel.

Second, there is the darkness of indifference. Sometimes I think the people who will be held most to account at the final settlement of accounts will not be the great gross sinners, who have yielded to the impulse of passion, but rather those men and women who, living in the midst of the light of Christ, have been absolutely indifferent to it, who have spent their lives in eating and drinking and playing, and have crucified the Son of God afresh.

In the third place, there is the darkness of positive transgression, the darkness of wilful and persistent disobedience, shown in acts of tremendous selfishness, which have added to the burden of the sorrows of the world. These are great darknesses, all of them, which the light of Christ has come to dispel.

Now, when light is analyzed, we find that it can be separated into rays, each one of which has some special significance and even quality. Red rays and violet rays have distinctive qualities. In the proper sense Christ, who is the light of the world, may be regarded as sending his light out into the world, along the line of certain rays, manifesting the divine enlightenment.

One of these might be called conscience. This may be what is called lightened, or unlightened. The glass in our windows is made for the purpose of letting light into the house. If we neglect to clean our windows, if we let the dust and dirt accumulate on them, the light cannot come in. So with conscience; neglect of it when it speaks, means the dimming of it. The best conscience needs to be kept in good order or it will soon fail to transmit the divine ray.

Letting in the Divine Light

Another ray of Christ and the divine in men we may call history. Both pagan and Christian history reveals the working of God. We break some law. We thrust our hand into the fire and find it brings pain. We eat improper food. We drink poisonous things. For all this we suffer. The transgression of the beautiful law of God anywhere brings trouble. History teaches us this. It is a divine ray.

Another ray of divine light is Bible revelation. "The entrance of thy words giveth light." John said that he was not the light himself, but was sent to bear witness of that light. "This," he said, "is the true light which lighteth every man coming into the world." The man who has a Bible, or can get one, and does not avail himself of what the revelation can bring to his soul, is heaping up condemnation, because he is sinning against light.

Another ray of divine light is individuals redeemed; in other words, witnesses to the power of Christ who are torches in history. A living example to-day, for instance, of the fact that Christ is the light of the world is a young Chinaman, by the name of Wong Kong, who is the highest salaried Chinese official in Hong Kong, at the head of a great steel corporation and an influential member of the Young Men's Christian Association. Before he would accept the position as manager of this great company he stipulated three conditions, which the steel company gladly accepted. First, he said he would not work for the company on Sunday. Second, he must be given freedom to preach the Gospel. Third, he must be allowed to choose the men he pleased as his employees. He is now making a trip around the world, to secure helpers and learn more of the Kingdom.

The Wonderful Light of Christ

Another instance of the great light of Christ in individual redemption is to be found in the man doing such a wonderful work in Portugal, Mr. Reginald Young. He was a gambler and a drunkard. He was converted at the gambling table, and has been doing a tremendous work all through Portugal. He has already gathered around him a personal following of one hundred and sixty-seven persons, old and young, who are enthusiastic for the redemption of their people. Of this number one was in Aveiro, another in Carminha, a third in Penafiel, a fourth in Santorem and a fifth in Lisbon. Three have gone to Brazil, and one deeply religious man is in Loanda. Here is one man's torch which has illuminated hundreds of others, who in their turn are illuminating thousands of others. It is true, as Christ said of his disciples, "Ye are the light of the world."

Another great ray of divine light represented by Christ is one's own soul experience. All you have learned of yourself in the past, in all you have sinned and suffered, when you have repented and rejoiced, all of this is a beam of light on the pathway of life, and it is the illuminating of the divine in your life, made possible by the mercy of God for your final redemption; and then, greatest of all, is the personal Christ. We may separate in our thought what we call the rays of light from the sun, but we trace them all back to that great body. We may separate in our thought all the different illuminations and influences of Christ in the world into these different rays, but we finally trace them all back to his own sinless personality.

This great light which has come into the world in Christ is good for the present and for the future. The present day problems, individual and national, can be solved only as they are solved in the light of Christ. Race troubles, troubles caused by selfish competition in business, all national and political and social problems will yield to a final happy solution only in the light of Christ and his teachings.

The "Light of Life"

And the future as well is illuminated by this light. "I am the resurrection and the life," "In my Father's house are many mansions." It is not enough for us to know that life is strong and happy and free in this world. We crave, and always will, to know something of the future. The light which came into the world with Christ illuminates the future. There is a future. As Christ rose from the dead, so also shall we rise with him. The light of life is not sealed up in the darkness of the tomb, but it penetrates into the tomb, even as did the angel who descended and sat there in glistening garments. This light goes on into the future so that we need not be afraid.

Let us not forget the final injunction, "Ye are the light." As Christ was the light of the world, even so are his disciples the light of the world. We can dim this light by our own action, in the first place, by failing to hold it up. The inverted torch smokes. One of the things which dims the light of many Christians is unnecessary grief. We miss something out of our lives. We lose some dear one, and we mourn and mourn unnecessarily. English people deplored the long years which their beloved Queen Victoria spent in mourning for her husband. They

MORE FARMS FROM UNCLE SAM

Settlers Fording a Stream on the Reservation

Lumbering in the New Reservation About to Open

THE present summer witnesses the opening to settlement of the most valuable agricultural domain Uncle Sam has turned over to his people in many years. It comprises a total of 750,000 acres in the States of Montana, Idaho and Washington. Inquiries, which have been pouring into the General Land Office at Washington ever since President Taft issued his proclamation on the subject several months ago, indicate that there is possibly greater interest in this distribution than in any previous apportionment of the public domain. While entries for these lands will not be made until April 1, 1910, all applications for registration must be made this summer and, a selection having been made by drawing of lot, the middle of August will see the country informed as to who are the most fortunate home-seekers; that is, which of the countless thousands of applicants will have their choice of the newly-opened land.

The new homestead land is embraced in three Indian reservations, known respectively as the Flathead, Coeur d'Alene and Spokane Reservations. The Flathead Indian Reservation, a portion of which is to be thrown open to settlement, is in Western Montana. On three sides are mountains, mostly covered with timber, while the valleys and foothills are mostly prairie land. Flowing through the reservation and fertilizing it is the Pend d'Oreille River, one of the headwaters of the Columbia River, which seeks the Pacific after forming the boundary between the States of Oregon and Washington. The Pend d'Oreille River, in turn, drains Flathead Lake, the largest body of fresh water in the West. This inland sea, on the shores of which many Americans are now seeking homes, is more than thirty-five miles in length and from ten to fifteen miles in width, thus being considerably larger than Lake George. The southern half of this lake is within the reservation.

The Coeur d'Alene and Spokane Indian Reservations are located in what is known as the "Inland Empire," the name applied to the territory embraced within eastern Washington, northeastern Oregon, northern Idaho and western Montana, lying in the Columbia River basin, between the Cascade Range on the west and the Rocky Mountains on the east. Like all the agricultural lands in this favored region, the tracts now to be opened are very productive and well adapted to wheat raising on an extensive scale. The proximity of the newly-opened land to the city of Spokane, Wash., the metropolis of the Inland Empire, makes these homesteads especially eagerly sought.

No one should get the idea that Uncle Sam is now placing on the market all the land in these important reservations. There are significant exceptions. The land which President Taft has proclaimed open to settlement comprises what is known as agricultural land and grazing land, together with some timbered land. The largest proportion of the land which is withheld goes to the Indians, whose home the reservation is, but who, in consequence of decreasing numbers, no longer have need of the entire reservation. Mineral and much of the timber land is also withheld from homesteading, these more valuable lands being disposed of later to the highest bidder or otherwise, as prescribed by law. To illustrate how these deductions reduce the total of the land available for entry, it may be pointed out that the Flathead Reservation, which is now so conspicuously in the public eye, contains, all told, about 1,425,000 acres. Of this 220,000 acres have been allotted to the Indian inhabitants, and the withdrawals of timber and mineral lands leave 440,000 acres subject to homestead entry.

The United States Government follows a very ingenious plan in opening to settlement Indian reservations such as those now claiming attention. For weeks past, prospective settlers have been pouring into the cities of Kalispell or Missoula in Montana, Coeur d'Alene in Idaho, and Spokane in Washington, to swear to and file their applications for registration. All applications are thence forwarded in plain envelopes to Judge James W. Witten, government superintendent. No envelope is received which bears a return card or any other words which indicate the name of the person who mailed it. On an appointed day, Judge Witten causes the accumulated mountain of mail to be thoroughly mixed and then selects envelopes from the mass indiscriminately, one at a time. The writer of the first communication that is picked up has first choice of all the lands subject to entry. Number two in this drawing has second choice, and so on, until as many numbers have been given out as there are parcels of land to be distributed. Any citizen of the United States who does not own more than 160 acres of land in any State or Territory may make application for homestead entry; but no married woman can obtain land in this manner unless she has been abandoned by her husband or else her husband is physically incapacitated and she is the head and main support of the family.

The homesteads are not actually given away. Persons who are so fortunate as to win farms must pay for them the appraised value of the land, as estimated by the government officials. However, Uncle Sam is very lenient in setting a price on his land. For instance, most of the land to be opened this summer is appraised at from $1.25 to $7 per acre, and yet there is no doubt that, once it is title clear, the land will sell in the open market at from $50 to $75 per acre.

No charge is made for registration, but when entry is made next spring from one-third to one-fifth of the appraised value must be paid, according to the location of the land, and the balance of the purchase money must be paid in five annual instalments, any lapse of these payments resulting in forfeiture. The homesteader must reside on his land and cultivate it. He may win a clear title by tilling the soil a part of each year for five years, or he may serve the same purpose by fourteen months' actual and continuous residence on the property, improving it meanwhile and paying the unpaid purchase money.

said it was not a good exhibition of Christian faith that she should put herself away from her people for so many years in personal grief, and I think they were true in their judgment of her.

One can dim the torch of life by living as the world lives. How shall the world see this light of life unless the Christian is a peculiar person, who is not like the man of the world? There must be contrast between light and darkness, or it is not light.

The torch of life also gets dim and smokes on account of disagreeable little habits. No torch can live which has continually thrown on it handfuls of dust. Each particle may be infinitesimal, but the number and continuance will finally put out the brightest light. Complaining, fault-finding, failure to meet honest obligations, false promises, yielding to temper, pride, indifference to the troubles of the world, selfishness in its many varieties, are all ways of dimming the light.

And greatest of all things which make the light grow dim is failure to replenish the source of light. This torch needs constant replenishing. The vessels must be filled up with oil. The source of spiritual life must be attached in order to have life a success. These great sources are communion with God, taking time for prayer, for the study of his truth and for the doing of his will.

It is fair to ask of any one, Are you living in the true light? "Light has come into the world to light every man who cometh into it." The great condemnation is that men love darkness rather than light. Why? Because their deeds are evil. Is it not fair, then, to ask ourselves, Are we not walking in the light because of evil? Do we hate to go to the light because our deeds will be revealed?

One of the greatest things the London County Council has done in the last few years is to open up the old slum district in East London. They bought this slum district for an enormous price. Between Southampton Row and Fleet Street there is a new highway. Years ago it was a congested slum district. The streets were little better than alleys. They were covered with filth and the tenements on either side reeked with disease and crime.

After the purchase by the London County Council these old rookeries were torn down. A broad, straight highway was cut through, and after it was all done it was called, very appropriately, "The King's Way." That is what Christ has done for the world. He has cut a King's Way for us to march over. His light has come down into dark places. He has opened up the way so that one can walk in safety, and he has paid a tremendous price for it. Will you choose to slink through the old alleys of sin, and the crooked ways of disobedience, rather than walk joyfully down this King's Way, which the Light of the world has opened for mankind? Let us walk in the light as he is in the light, remembering that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us from all sin.

PERSIA'S NEW BOY RULER

IT is reported that Mohammed Ali, the lately deposed Shah of Persia, will seek asylum in Russia, and that the Queen will accompany him in his exile. Zilles-Sultan, the uncle of the dethroned ruler, had a long conference with the British and Russian Ambassadors immediately after the deposition, at which, it is understood, the Shah's future residence was decided upon. A sufficient allowance will be granted him by the National Council, or Parliament.

It is regarded as a remarkable thing that the revolution in Persia, which resulted in the overthrow of the Crown and the establishment of the constitution, should have been carried through so swiftly and so successfully, with comparatively little loss of life and without exciting the slightest disturbance in the European situation. Following so closely upon the heels of the constitutional revolution in Turkey, it was full of notable coincidences. So complete was the Anglo-Russian understanding that there was not at any time, even during the acute period of the Nationalist operations, the indication of a desire by any other Power to interfere with the progress of events. All regarded the situation as one that must be allowed to work out its own solution, and that could not be helped by outside interference, which would simply have hindered the normal development of the national constitutional idea. That idea had taken hold very strongly on the hearts of the Persian people. It is part of the great wave of democracy which is now sweeping over many of the older Eastern lands at the present time.

The Persian National Council or Parliament

Shah Ahmed Mirza

Ahmed Mirza, formerly Crown Prince and now Shah, is a bright lad, though somewhat delicate. He will govern through a regent. The National Council, or Parliament, which includes some of the ablest men in Persia among its members, will doubtless follow a conservative policy and thus aid in restoring order and confidence as quickly as possible. Until now, it has been a Parliament in name only, the strong hand of England and the influence of Russia being practically the controlling powers in Persian affairs. The Anglo-Russian agreement has been termed "neither more nor less than a surreptitious apportionment of Persia to two powerful and dangerous neighbors." Whether the constitutional government will be able to assert itself to any appreciable extent, in the face of these conditions, cannot safely be predicted. Whatever it may do, with a view to restoring the integrity of the country, must be done slowly and cautiously. The acute character of the struggle among the rival European Powers for advantages in Persia may be understood from the following, taken from a leading Paris newspaper:

"Russia and England have monopolized every advantage to be got out of Persia, leaving only a small vantage-ground to Germany. It is to be hoped that France may come in for a share while the others are enjoying so many profitable privileges. The great cry nowadays seems to be 'business is business.'"

The story of Persia's constitutional battle may be briefly outlined. In January, 1906, Shah Mohammed Ali consented to the convocation of a National Council, or Parliament, which met in the capital on October 7 of that year. There are two Houses—the Council, with 156 members, and the Senate, with 60 members; the first elected by the voters (the nobles, priests, religious students, merchants, land-owners and tradesmen); the second appointed, one-half by the Shah and the other half by the Council. The new constitution, signed by the Shah on October 8, 1907, limits that ruler's prerogatives and his ecclesiastical authority, grants liberty of conscience and of the person, also liberty of speech, association and education. It also defines the duties of Parliament and the responsibilities of the Ministers. Several attempts were made by the Shah to abolish the constitution, but they were abortive. Meanwhile, the Nationalist movement grew, attracting to it the sympathy of the nation, and when it was realized that there was a danger of re-establishing the despotism of the throne the movement became an open revolution, which recently resulted in the dethronement of Mohammed Ali and the elevation of the Crown Prince to the throne, as already stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

At first all were curious to see the missionary and his goods, but they soon became more interested. Then they began to think it was nice to have a missionary near them, for he healed their sores; he gave them medicine and he let them taste of his strange foods, which they said were sweet. Their amusement was great when told that it was possible to write words on paper which another could read, or, as they said, "make paper talk." A day school was begun with three Christian boys, who came with the missionary, and from time to time others joined with them. The sick and lame gather in the veranda of the mission house for treatment. The missionary has from five to fifteen calls a day, and is able to help many suffering ones.

This work is still conducted by the missionary who began it. The land has been cleared and planted with fruit trees, which are now bearing. The first building (20x36, of poles and mud, with a veranda all round it) was built for a dwelling for the missionary, but for over a year it had to be used for church, school and dispensary as well. Then God sent the money for a church. This also is of poles and mud and has been in constant use for church and school since it was completed. Later the medical missionary visited the mission and built, with the aid of the boys, an admirable dispensary, with four rooms. Other buildings include a boys' dormitory, four huts for Christian families, a trading hut, a guest hut and buildings for sheep and goats. In that heathen land there is now a day school, with an enrolment of nearly 100, an average Sabbath congregation of nearly 100, 15 full members, 40 probationers, a Sabbath School, class meetings, midweek prayer meeting, two native teachers, many doing Christian work in the native villages, preaching on Sunday to the heathen and preparing themselves for usefulness. And many people are drawing near to salvation. The change wrought is almost incredible. Many now wear clothes. Christian men have taken Christian women for wives. They are sending their children to school. They are making larger gardens. They are writing letters. They read the Bible in their own language. They come to church with clean bodies and clothes. Some are making their own clothes. Their times of rejoicing are without beer. They love to sing and pray and learn. They are buying soap and nails and tools, sugar and cloth, books and slates. The hills and valleys resound with the hymns of the church, as the shepherds return at evening with the cattle and sheep. Twelve sons and daughters of the king are in school, some of whom will be teachers. Mount Makomwe is truly a lighthouse in a dark land. God has very graciously blessed the work there.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION of Sunday School Workers has entered into an arrangement with the Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, to give regular instruction to its students in Sunday School methods. The instruction will be given weekly, under the general direction of Secretary Marion Lawrence, assisted by Mr. W. C. Pierce, Dr. Franklin McElfresh, Mr. Hugh Cork and Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner.

—GOVERNOR R. B. GLENN, of North Carolina, has successfully prosecuted the work of stirring up the people, from Maryland to Texas, on the subject of home missions. The Governor is an elder in the Presbyterian Church and a teacher in the Sunday School. He made the fight of his life for the cause of temperance, when the State of North Carolina, under his leadership, gave a majority of 40,000 for State prohibition a year ago.

—EVANGELIST CHARLES INGLIS, long and favorably known in connection with Gospel work in England, will visit New York in September. He has preached in all kinds of places—prisons, coal pits, ocean steamers, log huts away on the rolling prairie, and in fashionable churches, and he has addressed all classes—red Indians, negroes, Chinese and the aborigines of Australia. In former years he was a welcome visitor and speaker at Northfield. He has been especially successful in revival work.

THE GREAT HUDSON TUNNELS OPEN

President Wm. G. McAdoo

JULY 19 was a memorable day in the two municipalities of Manhattan and Jersey City. At 10:17 o'clock on the forenoon of that day there suddenly broke out the biggest noise that has ever been heard on the lower Hudson, or along the Manhattan and Jersey shores, since the first white settlers came or since the gallant Hendrik Hudson came down the river with the Half Moon, after his voyage of discovery. At a given signal, the whistles of all the craft in the harbor seemed to shriek forth at once in simultaneous ear-splitting volume; engines ashore took up the theme and tooted and screeched their loudest, bells clanged crazily, twenty dynamite bombs were exploded with a deafening detonation, and from twice ten thousand throats there arose a cheer, loud, deep and prolonged, which might have been heard miles away.

This was the greeting accorded by the two cities to the welcome news that the electric power had been turned on that was to start the cars through the new twin tunnels under the Hudson. Meanwhile, a very interesting ceremony was taking place in the Terminal Building, in Cortlandt and Church Streets, New York City. The leading officials of both municipalities and a large number of men prominent in official and business life were in attendance. Chief Engineer Charles M. Jacobs of the tunnel system, and President William G. McAdoo, the projector of the tunnel, directed the arrangements. Miss Harriet Floyd McAdoo, daughter of the great tunnel builder, mounted a platform facing the guests, and, at a signal from Chief Engineer Jacobs, she touched a button and instantly every light went out. After a moment's waiting, she pressed another button, which lit up the place and sent a thrill of electric life along the rails of the twin tubes leading to Jersey City. This transmitted the electric power to the waiting trains, and it was at this instant that the pandemonium among tugs, steamers and engines broke loose in all directions, as already described.

One floor below that on which the opening ceremonies were taking place in the Terminal Building are the tracks on which four special trains were waiting. These were speedily filled with invited guests and the officials, and at 10:25:20 A.M. President McAdoo, standing by Motorman Winkley, himself gave the turn to the controller which sent the first train skimming over the rails toward Jersey City. The roadbed under the river was smooth, the atmosphere cool and agreeable, and the train sped so swiftly that the mile-and-a-quarter trip was over before the passengers realized it. The time of arrival was 10:28, the submarine journey having taken precisely 2 minutes, 40 seconds; the next train made it in 2:50; the third in 3:00, the fourth in 2:55—all demonstrating the validity of the claim made by the tunnel builders that the trip would be accomplished from New York to Jersey City in three minutes.

The passengers in these trains heard nothing of the tumultuous greetings above the river-bed and on the shore. It was not until they arrived in Jersey City, plunging right into the hubbub, that they realized what a hearty celebration was in progress. They stepped from the trains just as the bombs were exploded as a salute in honor of President McAdoo and the Hudson and Manhattan tunnels.

The rest of the day was devoted to speech-making and general jubilation over the great event. Never had Jersey City been so profusely decorated. Three stands had been erected at the City Hall and in the principal park, and speeches, glowing with enthusiasm and picturing the great benefits the people of both cities would derive from the sub-Hudson tunnels, were delivered by Mayor Wittpenn of Jersey City, Governor Fort of New Jersey, President McAdoo and Chief Engineer Jacobs.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the tubes were opened for regular business. Tunnel trains were run every two and one-half minutes up to 12:45 P.M., and at longer intervals during the rest of the night. The regular running time will be three minutes from shore to shore.

The Tunnel-Opening Celebration in Jersey City

The twin tubes, which now constitute the new link between the two cities, run from the Terminal Building, corner of Church and Cortlandt Streets, New York, and the Pennsylvania Terminal, Jersey City. Early this month a transverse tunnel, connecting the Erie and Delaware, Lackawanna and Western railroads with the system, the first at Jersey City, the other at Hoboken, will be opened to the public and the tunnel system will then be complete, with the exception of an extension from Twenty-third Street to the Grand Central Station, New York, which will require more than a year to finish. Seventeen months ago, the first pair of twin tubes under the Hudson, between Hoboken, N. J., and Sixth Avenue, New York, were opened to the public and have proved a great success.

The new tunnels, like the first two, are made of steel rings, bolted together, the interior diameter of each tube being 15 feet 3 inches. The outside is covered with a coating of concrete. The trains fit closely, acting as pistons and producing a rush of air behind. The tunnels rest at a depth varying from 60 to 90 feet below the river surface, and the average depth of earth and rock between the roof of the tubes and the river bottom is from 15 to 40 feet. The tubes are entirely separate and lie about 30 feet apart most of the way.

The tunnel cars are wholly of steel and fireproof, with sliding side doors at either end and in the middle. In the construction of the cars and the building of the station platforms everything has been done that science and skill could suggest to minimize the chances of accident through crowding or otherwise. Car doors open by compressed air. There are no signal bells; when all doors are closed, an automatic electric flash gives the signal and the motorman starts the train. This signal cannot be given until the last door is closed and all is ready.

By the opening of the Hudson tunnels a large suburban area is now brought within easy reach and becomes physically a part of the metropolis. It has been estimated by President McAdoo, the creator of the system, that with four-car trains the tunnels will carry in the neighborhood of 100,000,000 passengers per annum, and he adds that their united capacity will greatly exceed even that gigantic figure. With eight-car trains, of course, the estimate could be doubled. The cost of the entire river tunnel system, when fully completed, will be about $70,000,000. The company is known as the Hudson and Manhattan Railroad Company, and it holds perpetual franchises for the operation of the system.

Second only in interest to the tunnels themselves is the wonderful Hudson Terminal, in Cortlandt and Church Streets, New York. It is the largest office building in the world. Here are some of the figures:

Height, 275 feet above ground; stories, 4 below and 22 above ground; measurement, 18,000,000 cubic feet; contains 24,000 tons of structural steel; 75,000,000 pounds of concrete; 113 miles of electric wiring; 16 miles of plumbing pipe; 20 miles of steam pipe; 95 miles of conduits; floor space (all floors), 27 acres; number of offices, 4,000; number of windows, 5,000; number of occupants, 10,000; number of elevators, 39; elevator capacity, passengers daily, 40,000.

HOW THE KHARNE MARTYRS DIED

THIS week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD received from a gentleman in New York copies of several letters from persons in Asiatic Turkey. These are from eye-witnesses and survivors of the recent massacres and tell more vividly than any words of ours can possibly do the frightful barbarism of the unspeakable Turk.

The first is an extract from a letter written by an Armenian woman in Kharne, the widow of the martyred pastor of that place. She writes:

On Tuesday, April 13, my dear husband started for Adana and the annual meeting. On Thursday we had gone to visit some friends in our village, when suddenly a boy came running in, crying out, "Oh, mother, they say all we Christians will be massacred!" His mother fainted. When she recovered, we went home. We saw large parties of Turks in the streets, apparently holding counsel with each other. Half an hour afterward, the attack began; one house was set on fire. Then they rushed to the house of Ekiz Oghloo, took away the women and girls, and brutally murdered the father and his two sons and his brother-in-law; the house was plundered and given to the flames, with the dead in it. All over the village the same things were being done. We had hidden ourselves in a stable, and as we looked through a chink what a scene! The Turks were acting like wild beasts; women and children were screaming, our men were fleeing, as if the end of the world were come, but in vain; they were shot down by scores in the streets; the houses were on fire; the sheep were bleating, the cattle lowing, as if they sympathized with their masters. While some of the Turks were killing our men, others were breaking into the houses and shops for plunder, others were busy setting the empty houses on fire. I looked on while eight horse-loads of our belongings were taken from the house; but I thought my husband was still living, and so had comfort, praying as I was all the time. That night the Turks found us, and killed a man who had taken refuge in the stable. They ordered us to give up our money, but we had none to give. Then they tried to make us accept Islam; in this also they failed. Until morning we were in great danger. At dawn we escaped to the house of a Turk. From there we looked on while they killed all the men and boys of the Poladian family and burned the house. Only one woman was slain in the village. They kept us, as they said, to be divided up among themselves.

Tozjian (an Armenian) and his son offered a Turk named Hadji Bey eighty pounds to save them; he took the money, protected them for two days, then insisted they should become Moslems, and on their refusal killed them. The poor boy and his father, in the face of death, witnessed a good confession. "How can we deny our Saviour, whom we have loved so long?" they said. Both of them now belong to the Church on high. Hagopjan Agha and his son Avedis became martyrs after a like refusal to deny Christ: these were not the only ones. Oh, my friend, the Turks committed many outrages which I must not recount. Once or twice every day the Turks would come and carry away some of the younger women and girls. With all our efforts, our crying, our imploring, we could not save them.

The second letter was written by a young lady of Kharne to a friend in Tarsus.

There were fifty people gathered together in our house. While we were still singing and praying the Turks first threw hundreds of stones against the house, and at last set it on fire. Then we women and children scattered and fled. The men were all killed, either then or soon afterward. As we ran away we could scarcely get through the crowds of Turks in the streets, that were shooting and looting and burning the houses and shops. To save our own lives, we threw ourselves into the houses of some Turkish aghas; but their women thrust us out. At last, some had pity on us as we were wailing beside their walls and took us in for three days. According to what we heard from the Turks, Hohannes Tozjian and his son Samuel (my fiance) remained in hiding three days; then they were found and killed, having refused to accept Islam. The last words of Samuel were: "I cannot deny my Saviour, O Lord Jesus; into thy hands I commend my spirit." Then the cruel men shot him and his father. My own dear father witnessed, and died in the same way. I looked in vain for the body of my brother Manoog; his head was all that I could find. Without the help that comes through prayer, the remembrance of these horrors would drive me crazy. My once happy family has been smitten to the ground. All our property is in the hands of the Turks. I have not even a cup from which to take a drink of water; no bread to eat, no bed to lie on, no quilt to cover me these cold nights in the mountains. The German friends rescued us from that intolerable situation. May God reward these kind friends of the unfortunate.

In another letter is a list of the 177 dead in Kharne. In it are the names of a man and his six sons; the names of ten members of one family; the priest and his son; the Protestant pastor; a man and his three sons; five men with two sons apiece; fourteen men, each with a son slain with him; eight pairs of brothers; one case where three brothers, heads of families, are gone; one man and his wife, the only woman killed. Southeast of this village was a smaller one, with twenty-seven Armenians. A kind Turk protected them for a day in his house. Then he was overpowered by the wild mob, and the twenty-seven were taken out and slaughtered with knives, all on one large flat stone.

An Opportunity for Arbitration

AN Ethical Society abroad has circulated, in all the languages of the civilized world, a powerful plea for the application of Christian principles to every phase of national life. This appeal so strikingly resembles what has been urged many times in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that we gladly give space to an outline. It says:

Remember that reason alone and justice should decide the merits of any case, whether it be personal, national or international. Remember that no nation can be the judge in its own cause, because self-interest and pride and anger and force are so liable to pervert the judgment and distort the truth. Remember that, as friendly international relations are of vital importance to every people, the time is surely ripe for arbitration to supersede war. Remember, therefore, to press upon your government the duty of entering into specific agreement for peace, and, instead of war, to proceed by the methods of arbitration. Remember that the cost of competitive armaments not only involves a crushing burden for each people to bear, and consequent neglect of social improvement, but engenders bitter feeling and is provocative of strife. Remember in time of peace the horrors of war, and the harvest of hatred and misery it leaves behind, and ask yourself, each citizen, whether it is not criminal to leave it to passion or ignorance, to misunderstandings, or jealousies, or self-interest, to bring any such calamity upon the life of a Christian nation.

There is an opportunity near at hand for our administration to apply these principles. Bolivia and Argentina are on the verge of war—a useless war—over a boundary dispute. Such a struggle can establish no principle, vindicate no right. It should be referred to arbitration, and we hope to see the good offices of our government employed, in the strongest and most cogent way, to bring about a reasonable adjustment through a competent international tribunal.

The Value of the Immigrant

THERE is a point beyond which any law, forced to its extreme limit, becomes an absurdity and an injustice. This applies with special emphasis to the rule known as the "$25 test," which apparently has been established arbitrarily for deciding as to the acceptance or the rejection of newly-arrived immigrants. Sound, healthy men and women, coming here from other lands, are or ought to be welcome, because they are able to provide for themselves by their labor. To apply to such arrivals a test which demands that each possess a certain fixed amount of money is a palpable absurdity. As it now stands, a son of toil, of the kind that makes good American citizens, can be turned away, while the gates swing wide open for a vicious, worthless or even criminal applicant who can pass the ridiculous $25 test. This sort of immigration supervision is not what the country wants, nor what the law contemplates. To estimate the value of a man as an American citizen by his possession of a few dollars, more or less, is a proposition too fantastic to be seriously considered.

What, then, is the value of an immigrant? We are glad to be able to shed some light on this interesting question by quoting from a letter to the editor of this paper from Dr. Leander T. Chamberlain, vice-chairman of the Immigration Department of the National Civic Federation. Dr. Chamberlain, whose familiarity with this subject has made him a recognized authority, writes:

The foreign-born and their children, viz., their descendants of the first generation, have been and are essential to our national prosperity and strength. Should the foreign-born and their descendants of the first generation now leave the country we should lose, according to the census tables, nearly one-half of all farmers, ranchmen, etc.; more than one-fourth of all farm hands; more than one-half of all those in the learned professions; not far from one-half of our merchants, bankers and manufacturers; two-thirds of all miners and quarrymen; nearly two-thirds of household servants; more than two-fifths of our soldiers and sailors; nearly one-half of our clerks and salesmen, and more than one-half of all other wage-earners. The total population of the country would be diminished by more than one-third; eight of the principal cities by more than three-fifths. New York City would be reduced to 800,000. Into the country the immigrants brought in cash, in the year 1908, $17,794,226, besides paying $3,386,600.99 in the form of head-tax. It was only in 1895 that the government first made record of the money brought in by immigrants. From 1895 to 1908, immigrants brought to us in cash $177,053,594, besides the additional head-tax of some $17,000,000. In the form of the head-tax ($4 per immigrant) they pay for all the expenses connected with the immigration service: all the cost of buildings, hospitals, ferries, wharves; all wages of doctors, surgeons, inspectors, employees; even all the expenses connected with their condemnation as unworthy to be admitted.

Our immigration laws should be wisely and justly administered, with a view to our own protection, and no less with the purpose of according the fairest treatment to all who come from other lands to these shores to seek a home and a livelihood under our flag and to enjoy the blessings of our republican government. They are here in our hands, and at our absolute disposal. To deal with them in the arbitrary spirit of petty authority is to inflict a cruel injustice on the helpless victims and to rob the nation of good citizens.

Faith and Belief

IN these days of acute religious discussion, for the sake of clearness it is well to hold apart in thought the two words "belief" and "faith"; to use the word "belief" to represent the attitude of the intellect to truth—the assent of the mind to a proposition, a purely intellectual act; and to use the word "faith" to represent the attitude of the whole man—intellect, affections and will—not to a proposition, not to a truth, but to a person.

"Belief," then, engages the intellect alone; "faith" engages the whole being. "Belief" deals with propositions; "faith" deals with persons. "Belief" sees; "faith" takes hold. "Belief" assents; "faith" appropriates. "Belief" says, "Lord, Lord"; "faith" says, "My Lord and my God."

One day, in a great hospital, a brilliant young surgeon proposed to some other surgeons a new method for performing a certain operation on the brain. They were impressed with the truth and beauty of what he said and were enthusiastic in their approval of his method. Their minds entirely assented to his proposition. That was "belief." While they were still in conference, a gentleman came into the office, and said to the young surgeon: "Doctor, I am told that I must undergo a very delicate and dangerous operation, which involves the brain. I have been advised to come to you, and here I am. I put myself in your hands, and I have every confidence that you will do for me all that human skill can do." That was "faith."

Will Cuba "Make Good"?

CUBA'S progress since the American evacuation has not been altogether as satisfactory as was hoped for. There has been an intermittent revival of the old-fashioned political factionism so familiar in the days of Spanish rule, which now seems to express itself chiefly in discrimination against everything American. There has been a distinct moral retrograde movement, too. Cock-fighting has been restored and the lottery also. Apologists for these insular peculiarities argue that the first keeps the people too busy to dabble in insurrections, and the latter keeps them poor, but hopeful. Yet we believe there are enough far-seeing, sensible, patriotic people in Cuba to keep the careless, unruly element in check and to see that Cuba behaves and keeps her streets clean and orderly. Cuba must make good. If she falls back into the old condition of dirt and disorder, with pestilence and politics as the chief products of the island, she will miss her greatest opportunity and may have to be taken in hand again—this time permanently. If she does not make good this time, she may never have another chance.

Oriental Justice

JUSTICE has its peculiarities in Turkey, as in other lands. When the new government in Constantinople set out to punish the perpetrators of the Adana massacres, it showed commendable eagerness to make an example of the offenders, high or low. It summoned a court-martial and tried Djevad Bey, the Vali of Adana; Moustapha Pasha, the military commander at Adana; Youssuf Bey, a petty governor of a section of the vilayet, and others. Twenty-eight persons were hanged, including Mehmed Yusuf Pasha, military commander of the troops at Erzerum, three colonels, four lieutenants, three soldiers, a sheik named Valediti, and the proprietor of a newspaper which incited the fanatical uprising. Now comes the singular part of the affair. The court-martial's report, after mentioning the number of executions, says: "Three hundred deserve death, 15,000 deserve hard labor for life, 80,000 deserve minor punishment." To carry out so sweeping a judgment would be to deal practically with the whole Moslem population of the province; but the military court announced its readiness to go on, "cordon the town, and deal expeditiously with the matter"—in other words, carry out a wholesale execution. This, however, was apparently too sweeping for the Turkish sense of justice and it was suggested, in view of "the general good feeling which now prevails between the opposing elements, that general amnesty be made the occasion of a national fête." How the poor Armenian widows, and the thousands of survivors who lost all their dear ones and their worldly possessions in the massacre, must love these amiable Turks, who make this cold-blooded suggestion of a jubilee before the graves of their 30,000 hapless victims have even had time to grow green!

GENERAL NOTES

— COUNT ZEPPELIN now proposes to attempt to reach the North Pole with a new giant dirigible, to be built specially for the adventure, and which will be able to keep afloat for seventy hours.

— THE LITTLE ship, Half Moon, the replica of the Hendrik Hudson vessel of discovery, reached New York from Amsterdam on July 23, having been carried on the deck of an ocean liner. A full description (with photographs) from our special correspondent in Amsterdam, will appear in next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—THE EIGHTH International Convention of the Epworth League at Seattle closed July 11. Three thousand delegates attended. "Christ Enthroned" was the theme of the convention and the inspiration of all the addresses. The outcome of the whole event was a new impulse to Christian service, a strong plea for temperance, greater zeal for missions and a special appeal for a wider League work among the children.

— THE CASE of Professor Foster, who was recently rebuked in the Baptist Conference, seems to have raised a whirlwind in that denomination throughout the West. The Chicago Standard quotes from a number of letters from Baptist pastors and others, the writers of which roundly condemn the professor, while some of them call for action by the University. It is a pity to prolong the controversy. Let it die and be forgotten as soon as possible.

— A READER at Round Lake, N. Y., writes: "Fanny J. Crosby, whom the people know and love for her joyful work through the years, gave a faithful history of her life and ministry at a recent Sunday evening service at Round Lake. The throng were comforted by her serenity and joy in reciting the beautiful songs and testifying to her love for her work, and especially to the winning of those outside of the fold. A precious refreshing has been experienced and acknowledged by those who have heard the aged Gospel versifier. 'Saved by Grace' was sung at the close."

—THE FIRST International Aeronautic Exposition is held in Frankfort-on-Main, Germany, July 10 to October 31. It is intended for the exhibition of all kinds of motor balloons and other types of flying machines, including the great Zeppelin airship and the Parseval dirigible, as well as the aeroplanes of the Wright, Farman and other types. The exposition will have airship carousels, races, etc., and visitors will have opportunities to take airship excursions in the neighborhood of Frankfort.

—APART FROM its wickedness, the vulgarity of profanity makes it a vice which comes specially under the public condemnation. Fortunately, it is a vice which is on the wane. Several States have enacted anti-profanity laws, the latest statute on the subject being that in Wisconsin, which makes the offender liable to a fine of $25, or thirty days' imprisonment, or both. This is an eminently proper law, and one that should be duplicated in every self-respecting community. The "swearing brigade" is one of the discordant and immoral elements that jar on the sensibilities.

—AS A LAST RESORT, and with the hope of bringing about better conditions in Asiatic Turkey, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has made an appeal to the signatory Powers of the Treaty of Berlin. After referring briefly to the recent massacres, as "a flaunting disgrace before the whole world," the appeal urges the Christian governments to take such measures as will afford protection in Turkey to the Armenians as a race, and to the Christians as a whole. This is a timely and commendable step; but if we may judge the future course of "Christian Europe" by its past indifference, it may hardly be expected to accomplish much.

Flooded Wheatfields, St. Charles County, Mo.

Venice, Ill., Submerged by the Waters

Damaged by Flood

WHILE the Eastern States have been suffering from drought the West, on the other hand, has been passing through a terrifying experience with floods, which caused many of the rivers to burst their banks and pour in torrents across the fertile lowlands, carrying destruction in their path. These inundations, which occurred between July 12 and 15, were especially terrifying in the low-lying bottom lands in Kansas and Missouri. Great areas of standing wheat and corn were made to appear like lakes, most of the wheat being washed away after it had been cut and "shocked." Farm houses were flooded up to the second floor and many were swept off their foundations and wrecked. Hundreds of farms had this experience, and much live stock perished. At West Alton, Mo., the levee gave way and the postoffice, general store and other buildings were partially submerged. In East St. Louis, Ill., many buildings were under water and the great elevator was flooded to the first floor. In St. Clair County, Illinois, the Carr levee burst its banks, inundating a large tract of country and doing much damage. At Missouri Point, Mo., where the levee also broke, residents fled for their lives to higher ground, at 4 A.M. Many narrow escapes are recorded, and considerable suffering was experienced by those who were driven from their homes to higher elevations. Local and State authorities supplied prompt relief until normal conditions were restored.

People who make their farms and build their cities in the river-beds have great advantages, but perils also, which they must risk. The flood is the unusual thing. Gentle showers, growing crops and thrifty villages and cities are the rule. The disastrous flood comes now and then, reminding us of the dangers and damages that are a part of earth and the story of life. The reckless cutting away of forests has provoked added damage by flood. The rains that afflicted some portions of the country benefited the fields in other parts, and while there is national sympathy for those whose territory has been devastated there is gratitude to an all-wise Providence that there is such a bright promise of a plentiful harvest this year.

Which as a tempest of hail and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty waters overflowing. (Isa. 28 : 2.)

Workmen Share Profits

The International Harvester Company, of Chicago, has just announced a plan of profit-sharing with its employees. They have some thirty thousand workmen who can take advantage of the plan. The scheme is similar to that instituted some time ago by the United States Steel Corporation, and by other colossal industrial institutions. The Harvester Company has set apart 12,500 shares of the preferred stock, which is offered to the employees at $115 a share, which is $6 under the market price, and 15,000 shares of common stock, which is offered at $75 a share, about $10 under the market.

The most casual observer can see that there must be a better adjustment between capital and labor, for the happiness and profit of both, and this profit-sharing scheme by the employees looks as though it might be quite a step toward a solution of the problem. It will get better and more work for the employers and will produce a better temper and inspiration in the hearts of the workmen. A majority of the people of this country have to work, many of them very hard with their hands, and anything that will contribute to their physical, mental or moral welfare will be joyfully hailed by philanthropists, as well as Christians. The Bible, besides laying down the law of labor, asks for a just compensation for services rendered of a spiritual and mental, as well as physical, character. As the spirit of Christ permeates the heart of society, out of the competitions and frictions of life will come more honest work and a fair return for the same.

For the workman is worthy of his meat. (Matt. 10 : 10.)

The "Other-World Bureau"

Communication by cable under the ocean and by wireless telegraphy is to be outdone, so Mr. Stead says, by the "other-world bureau" which he is establishing in London, by which converse with the spirits of the departed is to be systematically carried on. Mr. Stead, in this connection, says: "The world into which we pass at death is neither up nor down, as the ancient theory had it. It is very near to us; in fact, it is right here. We have a veil over our eyes, so that we cannot see it now. At death that veil is lifted, and we come into the 'other world' as a blind man would come into the light."

We would not disagree with this definition of our relation to the other life, but when he proposes to found a commercial bureau and institute communications between the living and the dead we would have to part company with him. There have been many deceptions in these pretended communications. For good reasons our heavenly Father has separated us from our dead, but faith in their life and love is an added inspiration to faithful service, which will be rewarded under divine grace with a reunion forever. Even in so important a thing as the salvation of a soul, God has not seen fit to send the spirits of the dead back to the living to help them.

And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead. (Luke 16 : 30, 31.)

A Premium on Babies

Landlords usually seek tenants with small families, and like it the better if there are no children to pick the paper off the wall, knock holes in the plastering, or dab their soiled hands on the clean paint. Max Dick, owner of a big tenement house on Rivington Street, New York, is an exception to this rule, and gave notice to his tenants the other day that he would pay $150 to the family of eight children in which a boy baby is born; $100 to the family of fewer than eight children in which a boy baby is born, and $500 to that family in which twins next appear. There are now in the tenement house sixty-eight families, including 199 children. Especially interested in this prize offer of Mr. Dick was the family of Bashe Amsted Esky, in which there are eight children, and that of Paul Leibowitz, in which there are also eight children. These are the only ones eligible for admission to class "A." The number eligible for class "B," in which the prize is $100, is also large. Twins have never been born in the building, so in this third class there are no statistics. The caretaker of the flat said that they had more babies in this building than in whole blocks in other parts of the city. Mr. Dick is fond of babies, and thinks it is a shame that so many flat-buildings are closed against them.

We do not understand why Mr. Dick should have put a premium on boy babies, as they do in Oriental countries, nor do we understand his motive in spending so much money in prizes of this kind. In the swift promotions of our free country, the children of poverty sometimes, in one generation, leap to the front in wealth, fame and influence; and very soon become the support, rather than the burden, of their parents. It may be that Mr. Max Dick is a Hebrew, and shares the belief of his race in large numbers of children. Among the great blessings which the Psalmist promised to those that feared God was a large family.

Killed by Over-Study

Eleanor Freitag, who lived with her mother and grandmother in Long Island City, was ambitious to become a teacher and the support of the family. She worked desperately hard at her books, trying to do four years' work at the Bryant High School in three. She even crowded incessant toil into the hot summer days. The strain unbalanced her reason, and early the other morning she sent a bullet through her brain, and her beautiful promising earthly life was ended. It is necessary to have a high standard in the public schools and the greatest diligence is required to reach it, but there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of children that are driven to excessive toil in the preparation of their lessons, and the health and even lives of many of them are sacrificed as the result. It is a religious duty for parents and teachers to see that a child shall only do as much mental work as is consistent with its physical strength.

Much study is a weariness to the flesh. (Eccles. 12 : 12.)

From the Sky Into the Ocean

The science of flying is in such an experimental stage that there is a great disparity between the promises of the human "flyers" and their fulfilment. Hubert Latham advertised to the world that he would fly across the English Channel in his monoplane, and undertook the task. When three miles and a half from the French coast his machine dropped into the water, from which he was rescued by the French torpedo-boat destroyer Harpen. When the boat reached him, Latham was calmly perched in his seat, puffing a cigarette, while the monoplane rode the waves easily. The London Mail had offered a prize of £1,000 for the first aeroplane to make a successful flight across the Channel. Latham went up to a great height on a long slant, and then straightened out for the trip to Dover, when he came to grief. The aviator said: "The breakdown was absurd and annoying, but I will do it next time, and do it before August 1." And so he will, or some one else who navigates the air will yet fly over the Channel and over the continents and seas. It will be hard to find the limit of human genius, courage and persistency.

He shall come up and fly as the eagle. (Jer. 49 : 22.)

FLAGS FOR OUR BATTLESHIPS

Cutting and Measuring Battleship Flag

Embroidering Intricate Designs on Flags of Foreign Nations

Flag-Making Plant, Brooklyn Navy Yard

IN the outfitting of all the big battleships for the United States Navy, the naval flagmaking establishment in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, little known to the outside world, plays a most important part. To furnish all the ships with their full stock of foreign flags, and the various signal and saluting flags necessary on their long cruise, many thousands of flags are needed. To cut out, sew and complete these Uncle Sam maintains an extensive plant, which is kept going at full time all the year round and employs nearly half a hundred skilled needlewomen and a few men.

The flag room is on the third floor of the Bureau of Equipment Building. On entering the large room, the visitor sees rolls of bright bunting heaped up, while long lines of electrically-driven sewing machines, with women operators, are reeling off and putting the finishing touches to American and foreign ensigns of many different hues and patterns.

A good idea of the number of flags that must be carried by a single ship can be gathered from a large pile, shoulder high and fifteen feet long, just finished for the new battleship Michigan. About one-half of the lot is composed of the foreign flags, encased in thick paper bags. The name of the country is stenciled on the bottom. The remainder, including flags for ordinary use, signal set for the international code, etc., are not wrapped, but tied in round bundles and lettered. The pile contains 250 different flags, the regulation number for ships in the service. It is necessary to equip them for all forms of ceremonial and official occasions, saluting and signaling, both at home and in foreign waters. With an extensive array of flags stored on board, the ship is prepared to meet officials of any nation.

The foreign complement contains 43 flags, each 25 feet long and 13 feet wide. Certain of these are full of animal shapes, curious designs and marine landscapes. They are, therefore, difficult to make and require considerable time to finish. All the bunting comes from Lowell, Mass., in lots of several thousand yards.

The flags are cut out from measurements arranged on chalk-mark lines and metal markers on the floor. Large strips and certain designs can be more conveniently stitched in this way. Daily this checkered section of the floor is covered at all hours with several different flags, while the men and women cutters are at work. The thousands of white stars used on the flags are cut out by an ingenious machine, operated by electricity. Some eight different sizes of stars are used, each having a special cutting die. Two men sew on the flax ravens, heading and the wooden toggles to the finished flags. Afterward, the heading is stamped with the name of the ensign and date of contract.

The largest flag made is the United States ensign No. 1, which is 36 feet long by 19 feet wide, and costs $40 to turn out. The President's flag requires the longest time of any to make, as it takes one woman a whole month to finish it. This consists of a blue ground, with the coat-of-arms of the United States in the centre. The life-sized eagle, with long, outstretched wings, and other emblems are all hand-embroidered and involve the most patient work. This flag is made in two sizes, 10 feet by 14 feet and 3 feet by 5 feet. The embroidery silk used on this and other designs costs $9 a pound. The foreign flags are the most showy and difficult to make. This is notably true of the flags of the Central and South American republics, two of the most tedious being those of Salvador and Costa Rica. From 100 to 200 different pieces are used in these different ensigns, all of which are patiently sewed on by hand. A separate corps of hand embroiderers do nothing but this kind of work, and it occupies the time of one woman sixteen days to complete the Salvador design. The cost of making the Salvador flag is $52.50; it is the most expensive foreign emblem made.

Each ship is entitled to a new supply of flags every three years. Over 15,000 flags were turned out last year, requiring the use of some 100,000 yards of bunting in their manufacture. The bunting costs 25 cents a yard, and over $25,000 worth was consumed in last year's output. The needlewomen netted more than $20,000 by their skill and labor.

LILLIAN E. ZEH.

AMONG THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Two Valleys*

WE are accustomed to say that the complications of modern civilization have rendered life harder than in former times. Wherever we go, we meet the unhappy and the afflicted. We hear many scoffing questions, such as "Is life worth living?" and "Is marriage a failure?"

The study of the Pilgrim's Progress shows one thing without question: that life has always been hard. To go further back, the Psalms of David, the book of Job—in fact, all ancient literature, sacred and profane—reveal clearly that man has always been "born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward." It cannot be escaped. The Slough of Despond and the Two Valleys come into every man's life. All reason and revelation tell us that sorrow and humiliation are good for the soul. We must believe that God chastens us in love. We moan beneath the rod; but in his name we may conquer the foul fiends, and he will turn the shadow of death into morning.

All of us have to pass through the Valley of Humiliation, but a certain young minister once related in a public meeting a singular experience in that line. He was traveling and was forced to appeal for a lodging to a certain farmer, a member of a church, but of a morose and suspicious disposition. He had been once or twice imposed upon by vagrants who had pretended to be ministers, and he looked upon the young clergyman with a distrustful eye. The youth was not attractive in appearance, and he was especially depressed upon that evening.

The cold reception given him by the farmer did not raise his spirits; neither did the catechizing which followed, regarding his origin, destination and general circumstances. Indignant and heartsore, he could scarcely command his temper, but he resolved to copy the meekness of his Master. At last he was bidden to go to the stable and feed his horse, and then come into the house.

There he was set to eat in the kitchen, apart from the family, and at this crowning indignity he resolved that, although it was rainy and his horse was tired, he would resume his journey as soon as he had refreshed himself. Presently he and the hired men, who were eating with him, were summoned into another room to participate in the evening prayers of the household. The farmer read a chapter in the Bible. Then he paused, as if embarrassed. At last he turned abruptly to the newcomer and asked him to lead in prayer.

The young minister knelt and poured out his anguished soul before God. Never was a prayer more deep and sincere. Upon all present its effect was overpowering. The pathos, earnestness and spirituality of his petitions went to every heart.

As the little company rose from their knees the farmer, with flowing tears, begged the young man's pardon. "How were you able to bear insult so calmly?" "The love of Christ constrained me." The young minister stayed over Sunday, and preached in the church of the village, and a great revival was the result. Through the Valley of Humiliation he had reached that blessed spot where the leaves of healing were applied by the hand of the messenger of God.

Slighted Mercies*

THE attitude of thankfulness and appreciation seems to be an unnatural one. Human beings complain far oftener than they either endure calmly or feel gratitude. A little child once said of a servant in the house: "She explaints [complains] all the time. She explaints of her food, and of her room and everything."

The attitude of "explaint" is easily acquired. On the other hand, it is argued that if every one were satisfied with everything, there would be no progress. "A divine discontent" seems to be necessary in order that we should rise to nobler heights, not only in spiritual but in temporal things.

In Lowell's beautiful poem, "The Fountain," he expresses the proper mental view regarding this condition. The fountain presses upward constantly, yet never unseemly overflows. It is > Ceaseless aspiring, ceaseless content.

"Divine discontent" is of this sort, forever seeking the higher and better, yet never grumbling over its lot.

Samuel Longfellow depicts beautifully the Christian spirit, in this little sermon upon thankfulness for the unexpected blessings which God sends us: "He drops this added sweetness into his children's cup, and makes it run over. The success we were not trying after, the strain of music in the midst of drudgery, the beautiful morning picture or sunset glory thrown in as we pass to or from our daily business, the unsought word of encouragement, these and a hundred others that every one's experience can supply, are instances of God's love, the overflowing riches of his grace, his free gifts."

By persistently keeping our eyes fixed upon this never-ceasing outflow of mercies, especially in our hours of gloom, we may breed in our souls that spirit of habitual thankfulness, in which we are so likely to be lacking.

The quaint diary of Pepys, to which we often turn for details of the social and political life of the seventeenth century, does not often edify us morally or spiritually; but sometimes old Pepys gives us, by chance, a maxim of value. For instance, he says that a man named Bowdler was wont to deplore the lamentations which he heard on every side regarding the unhappy state of England. "If," said he, "a man were to go from the northern to the southern extremity of this island, with his eyes shut and his ears open, he would think that this country was sinking into an abyss of destruction; but if he were to return with his ears shut and his eyes open, he would see that we have the greatest reason to be satisfied with our prosperity." Do not trust the croakers. Look around for yourself, and you will be sure to find much to be thankful for.

Browning, in his wonderful lament for his friend, in La Saisiaz, reviews the course of life, speculates upon our case if no sorrow should ever shadow us, and ends by thanking God for the trials that perfect us, in this eloquent outburst:

> Only grant my soul may carry high through death
> her cup unspilled,
> Brimming though it be with knowledge, life's > loss drop by drop distilled.
> I shall boast it mine—the balsam—bless each > kindly wrench that wrung
> From life's tree its utmost virtue, tapped the > root whence pleasure sprung,
> Barked the bole, and broke the bough, and bruised
> the berry, left all grace
> Ashes in death's stern alembic, loosed elixir in > its place!

An Open Letter to the Summer Girl

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE hears the term "the summer girl" uttered as if it were a badge of reproach. It seems to be taken for granted that the summer girl a coquette, that she flirts with men whom she ardly knows and that she does all sorts of things hat are offensive to good taste. I am not going to hink or to speak of the summer girl in this way. o me she is a pretty creature, who harmonizes ith the flowers and rejoices in the freedom that ummer brings. She is fond of athletics and atches a baseball game with critical appreciation. he understands the game from start to finish as ell as the players do, and when somebody whom she nows makes a home run, or slides a base, or pitches particularly good ball, her delight is unbounded. he can handle an oar, reef a sail, prepare a picnic inner, make coffee at a brush-wood fire and do to erfection everything girlish and womanly while njoying life as keenly as any boy. The summer irl belongs to the season and to outdoor life. She an hold her own in outdoor sport. My deal summer girl is friendly, cordial nd mirthful, with a hand-clasp that neans something and a glance that looks he world in the face. She is a sunbeam f a girl, and whatever place she enters he is sure to brighten. Now, may I tell ou some of her perils?

First, she is a trifle in danger of be-ng too readily confidential with stran-ers. She should be a little on guard vith people who are unknown to her, uite as much on guard with women lder than herself as with men of her wn age. By this I do not mean that he should be stand-offish and disagree-ble and brusque, but she should not be n haste to talk freely with strangers, to ell them of her home affairs, or to give hem confidence. Friendship is a plant f slower growth than the acquaintance f a day or two. The summer girl sually has an aunt, a mother or a mar-ied friend who is her chaperone, and he should allow this older woman to uide her in the intimacies into which he drifts.

Another caution, number two this ime, is not to feel altogether certain hat the pleasant intercourse of a week t a country inn or a month in the moun-ains will continue when girl and man have gone back to the pursuits of the town. The young fellow away on a vacation, whether college student, law-yer's clerk or salesman in a warehouse, is impressionable and susceptible and out for a good time. He meets a girl who has all the elements for good com-radeship, and if, as it often happens, the really young people at a rural resort are few, and the larger number of guests are mothers and children and elderly ladies sitting about in white shawls, the girls and the men in their twenties pair to-gether. They walk and drive and play games, they sing songs to the accom-paniment of a depressing piano, whose strings give out a tinny sound, and in summer fashion their acquaintance rap-idly matures.

The summer girl is foolish if she builds too much on this especial friend-ship. Let a man take the initiative in seeking to have it prolonged. If he wishes to know her better, let him ask permission to call on her in her home when, later, vacations are over and the routine of ordinary life is resumed. Whatever may be the lot of the girl, the man must soon be in harness again. It is for him to court and for her to be courted, and the superficial acquaintance of a summer boarding-house does not usually terminate in anything so serious as courtship.

Caution number three is one at which girls laugh. When they are advised not to get too tired, not to spend every hour of every day in tramping and every hour of every evening in amusement, they toss their pretty heads and intimate that they have not an idea of the meaning of fatigue. Nevertheless, they will return from the summer pleasure in much better condition for what is to come after if they have taken heed of the ounce of prevention. Late lingering in the moonlight is all very well; but, girls, one secures her beauty sleep by retiring two hours before midnight.

The summer girl ought to carry with her to the country a book or two worth reading, and if her correspondence is in arrears she should snatch a little time every morning in which to write letters to friends who will be glad to hear from her. If she is courteous and deferential to the elderly ladies in the white shawls, sometimes holding wool for them and sometimes running on their errands, she will make for herself a warm place in their hearts. Every one of these old ladies was once a summer girl herself, and some of them have more sympathy with the summer girl of to-day and more admiration for her than her own mother has.

THE SPRING

Out of the depths of earth,
Down from the mountains high,
Crystal clear from its birth,
The spring pours ceaselessly.

Birdling and flower and child
Drink from its sparkling rim;
Till forth from the tangled wild
It flies to the ocean dim.

The Missionaries' Greatest Trial

DO people who speak lightly of the heroism of foreign missionaries, and who declare that many of them lead lives of ease, ever pause to think of the trial it must be to a father and mother to spend long years in absence from their children? At the season of life when youth is most interesting, when mothers cling most closely to daughters, and fathers take greatest pride in the development of sons, the children of missionaries are sent to the homeland to be educated. For every reason they cannot be permitted to remain with their parents after the earliest years of childhood. In climates where the heat is maintained at a high temperature through the twelvemonth, children of English or American parentage cannot enjoy vigorous health and must grow up enervated and weak. Were it only to preserve their health, their parents must consent to a separation. Then, too, in an atmosphere polluted by the practices of heathenism and poisoned by immorality the children of missionaries cannot be trained in honor and purity. For reasons of spiritual and mental growth they cannot remain on the field where their parents labor. As the missionary promises to remain at his post for a term of years, seldom less than seven, before taking a furlough, it is easy to see that great changes come to children in that period. A missionary mother, talking with a friend about the matter, said that she could never explain the pang she felt when her daughter of twelve did not know her on her return from India to America. She had kissed the child good-by when the little thing was only five years old.

Our foreign missionaries make no complaint on this score. They accept this great trial without murmuring, for the sake of Christ and for the evangelization of the countries to which they go. We who are at home with unbroken circles in the household, the merry voices of children around us, ought in our prayers to remember those who surpass us in their valor and nobility. We ought, if possible, to brighten the lives of children whose parents are on the other side of the globe. Opportunities to do this may come in our way if we are on the watch for them. The children of foreign missionaries are usually placed in the care of kindred or friends, but they are sometimes in charge of institutions of learning, and are obliged to spend their holidays among those who have only a commercial relation in reference to them.

Favorite Charities

There are charities which make an appeal to the public, and for which it is never difficult to raise funds. For example, every one who can give at all gladly gives in aid of a hospital. Tag day has recently resulted in largely augmenting hospital funds in several localities in New Jersey. The plan is for a number of young girls, dressed in white, wearing a nurse's cap and having on their arms a red cross, to solicit contributions from every one they meet. The girls modestly speak to the passer-by, inquiring whether he or she will be tagged. When the tag is fastened on the coat or dress, the person tagged drops a contribution into the box offered by the girl in white.

In Essex County, New Jersey, tag day taking place in the end of June, resulted in adding two thousand dollars to the hospital funds. No special amount is asked. Any sum from one cent to ten dollars or more may be put in the box. This plan could not be carried out by girls in large cities, but in towns where people are well known to one another it is not open to objection.

A BONFIRE OF BOOKS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

ON his third missionary journey, A.D. 54 to 58, the apostle Paul made a fresh start from Antioch in Syria. At Tarsus he went through the Beilan Pass, and came to Derbe, Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, visiting the churches he had established on his first missionary journey. He had also visited them, it will be recalled, on his second missionary journey.

Leaving Antioch in Pisidia, he came directly to Ephesus. Ephesus was a splendid and important city. Paul had been there for a very short time on his second missionary journey. His good friends, Aquila and Priscilla, had come to Ephesus partly for business reasons, as Ephesus was noted for tent manufacture, and partly because they had anticipated that Paul would make a long sojourn in the city and they desired to be near him. His stay there covered two years.

The most magnificent building in Ephesus was the Temple of Diana, which is counted as one of the "seven wonders of the world." It was built of the purest white marble, and was 425 feet long and 220 feet broad. There were porticos around the four sides of the building, composed of 127 columns. These columns were 60 feet high. But how completely has all of this magnificence disappeared! When the pilgrims of the Jerusalem Cruise visited Ephesus in 1904, they were shown a broken heap of ruins which mark the site.

When the apostle Paul came to Ephesus he did not enter the Temple of Diana, but "he entered into a synagogue" instead. How despicable a place it must have seemed in comparison with the temple! Paul's visit to Ephesus was not made as a sightseer, but as a preacher of the Gospel. It is recorded that he spoke boldly for the space of three months on Sabbath days in the synagogue, "reasoning and persuading as to the things of God." At the end of that time he was forced by the unfriendliness of the Jews to seek another preaching place. The lecture-room of a Greek professor named Tyrannus was opened to him, and there for two years he taught daily both Jews and Greeks, who came to hear him. The power of God was with Paul, and enabled him to do miracles of healing, even by permitting parts of his clothing to be carried to the sick, who were thereby made well. This aroused the jealousy of a priest named Sceva, and his seven sons, who were magicians, and they tried in the name of Jesus to cure a demoniac.

The evil spirit came out of the demoniac and fell upon Sceva and his sons, and so frightened them that they ran out of the house and were sorely wounded. But all of this worked for the furtherance of the Gospel, because "fear fell upon them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified." Among those who came confessing their sins and seeking Jesus were some of those who, like Sceva, had practised the magic arts. The genuineness of their turning from Diana to Jesus was vividly shown when they brought together their books of magic and burned them in a public place—books worth fifty thousand pieces of silver (between nine and ten thousand dollars; but that amount should be multiplied many times to represent its real value in our money). By this act one source of wickedness was recognized to be bad books. We are reminded of the burning of opium pipes which has taken place in many cities of China during the past two years. The burning of those bad books went a long way toward cleaning up the city of Ephesus, which had the name of being a hotbed of superstition and witchcraft.

"What is your daughter reading?" asks a friend of a woman whose daughter is in the habit of doing about as she pleases.

"Oh, I don't know; I dare say something harmless."

"You don't know! Do you mean to say that you allow your daughter to read anything she chooses, without first examining it yourself?"

"Why, she has read so many books she ought to be capable, by this time, of choosing for herself. Besides, I don't get time to read nowadays; there's so much sewing to do for the children."

The absurdity of such a remark! that a girl just coming into life (if one may so express the awakening from childhood to womanhood) should be as capable of judging for herself as a mother who has had years of experience!

"The reason I asked," resumed the first speaker, "was that we have been reading, daughter and I, a very interesting book, Girls Who Became Famous, and did not know but that your girl would like to read it too."

"Oh, biography is so dull, I never could get interested in it; and I presume she wouldn't care anything about it," was the thoughtless reply.

A man who has made a study of crime says: "The main source of crime is the 'bandit literature' that is found on every news-stand of the cities and carried by the United States mails to every postoffice in the country." That gives us a clue by which we can make an appeal to our boys. Tell them what a bandit is: a man who watches for an opportunity to take by force money from a man who has honestly earned it—the bandit has probably never earned an honest dollar in his life. It matters not to the bandit if he kills the man in the effort to get his money; perhaps, from his point of view, there is all the more "glory" in it. And let it now be told the boys and girls that "bandit literature" is published to make money, and so it is as mean a trade as that of the bandit. Possibly it is meaner, because it selects for its victims young people, and by one-cent papers, five-cent books and dime novels it steals what little money young people have. The bandit publisher kills character, and that is meaner than killing the body, as the bandit does.

It is in the power of parents and teachers to clean up any city or town of all forms of "bandit literature" by forcing news-stands and bookstores to stop selling it. They might righteously gather such stuff together and have a public burning, as was done at Ephesus. Some States have excellent laws about this matter, and it is the experience of one gentleman who has given much attention to it that usually, when booksellers and newsdealers are told there is a law in their State against selling bad literature and that they will be held responsible if they continue to do it, they are quite willing to take it out of their windows and away from their counters at once. Ohio has a specially good law, worthy of imitation by other States.

The Sunday School library should be the safest of all libraries, and by means of it the noblest, purest taste for reading should be formed.

President Tilman in addressing a graduating class at Johns Hopkins University said, among other things: "It is quite time that we establish a professorship of what to read and how to read." And the same professorship might include when to read and where to read. Many people, particularly boys and girls, will say they have

PAUL'S THIRD JOURNEY

By Mrs. M. Baxter

AFTER his ministry at Athens, Paul went to Corinth, where he remained a year and a half, and then, owing to the rejection of his Gospel among the Jews in that city, and having been used of God to gather out from the Gentiles a little witnessing church, he knew that his ministry there was ended, and he sailed for Syria, taking with him Priscilla and Aquila. Cenchrea was in the south of Achaia, and there a Christian church or assembly had been founded. This landing in Europe was the last stage of Paul's second missionary journey.

On his journey he, with his two companions, came to Ephesus, the great commercial port of Asia Minor, and left them there, after having borne his testimony and reasoned with the Jews in the synagogue. The object of his journey seems to have been the same as his former visit at the end of his first missionary journey: to return to Antioch, from which place he and Barnabas had been sent forth by the Holy Ghost, and to report to the church what God had taught him and wrought by him. From Antioch, always his starting place, he began his third missionary journey, which was again in Asia Minor, where, during his second journey, he was not permitted to preach the Gospel. He went throughout Galatia and Phrygia, stablishing and strengthening all the disciples.

When a man's will is given up to the Lord, and he has no desire or choice as to his movements or his sphere of work, when he ceases to think himself indispensably important to God or to the Church of Christ, God gives him an indescribable sense of liberty to do such and such a thing, to go to such and such a place, while he will shut up the way to another and give him just as strong a consciousness that that is not the way. It is not mere impulse; there is nothing like excitement in it; it is the still small voice of God by his Spirit. Ephesus was on the Lord's heart, and he laid it on Paul's heart. Yet Paul was in no hurry. When God is about to visit a place, he makes all ready. Man would smile at the idea that two simple tradespeople, like Aquila and his wife, could, by their very presence in Ephesus, have anything to do in preparing the Lord's way in that city. But God sees otherwise. When God thought upon Ephesus, there were two who could reciprocate his thoughts; the God who seeks spiritual worshipers found these two in the midst of the heathen city, and already the nucleus of a Christian church was formed by one Christlike man and his wife.

A certain Jew, a very gifted man, came to Ephesus, a man "mighty in the Scriptures," but knowing only the baptism of John. With unusual power he could teach men to repent, and "he spoke boldly in the synagogue." Now was the time for God's two patient witnesses. They had no such gifts as Apollos; but they knew the way of the Lord as he did not. Something about their very presence must have inspired him with confidence; he accepted their faithful ministry, and learned from them the way of God more perfectly; and, though Paul had not yet returned to Ephesus God's visitation in grace had already begun in the city; Apollos "mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ."

The time came when Apollos left Ephesus to follow up the work of God by Paul at Corinth, and Paul, having visited the churches of Asia Minor, came to Ephesus. His keen spiritual discernment soon discovered among certain disciples a most important lack. These men only needed light. Their minds were in darkness about the Holy Ghost, but their hearts were right; they were baptized in the name of Jesus, Paul laid his hand on them, and twelve of them received the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues and prophesied.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

not time to read. Let us see. There are twenty-four hours in a day; nine hours are needed for sleep, possibly one hour and a half for meals, six hours for school; that leaves seven and a half hours to be divided between home duties, home study, play and reading. With three hours for study, one hour for home duties and two hours for play, there would be an hour and a half left which might be devoted to reading. Let this be divided between the Bible and other books. Only a child needs nine hours of sleep; eight hours are sufficient for an older person. That will give all the more time for reading. In the summer, children should have a vacation course of reading, arranged by parents or teachers.

A young minister determined to read an hour a day. He says: "Early in 1905 I resolved to try an experiment on a systematic course of general reading requiring an hour a day during the year. I chose the Bible first, because it is the world's greatest literary classic. I found that by reading ten minutes a day I could go through it in a year. I found I could read from thirty to forty pages an hour in the ordinary sized volume. Thirty pages a day makes 11,000 pages, or 35 volumes of 300 pages each, in a year. Forty pages a day makes 14,000 pages, or 48 volumes of 300 pages each in a year. I chose the latter. I next selected Nicolay and Hay's Life of Lincoln—ten volumes, which averaged about 475 pages each. By twenty minutes' reading a day I have been able to go through this masterpiece of political biography and statesmanship. A half hour's reading a day was left. Here my professional bias somewhat influenced me. However, I did not decide upon the complete list at the beginning of the year. This was well, for some new books were published, which I was glad to include in the list, notably Professor Curtis' volume, The Christian Faith, and the Methodist Hymnal. Besides the Bible there were included in the list The Life of Lincoln, Our Own and Other Worlds, by Hamilton; The Light of the World, by Brooks; The Crisis, by Churchill; A Preacher's Story of His Work, by Rainsford, and Goethe's Faust."

A word now to the thousands of people in the humble walks of life who lament the lack of an education. There are few who could not find at least an hour each day for thoughtful reading, if they would resolutely undertake it.

Great Medical Associations Condemn Benzoate of Soda in Food

The American Medical Association, numbering over 65,000 members, is the largest and most influential medical body in the world. At the Association's annual convention, held at Atlantic City, June 10th, the following resolution was passed concerning the drugging of foods with Benzoate of Soda or other chemical preservative:

"Resolved, That the American Medical Association respectfully urges upon Congress the necessity of amending the national pure food and drugs act in the following particulars, viz:

"(1) To prohibit absolutely and unqualifiedly the use of Benzoate of Soda and similar preservatives in the preparation and preservation of foods destined for interstate commerce.

"(2) ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ (c), the prevention of the utilization of unclean and offensive waste productions, which now, by the use of such preservatives, are branded as foodstuffs and sent through the channels of commerce."

Resolutions of similar import have also just been passed in the great conventions of the American Institute of Homeopathy (25,000 members), The Medical Society of New Jersey, and The Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association.

These resolutions constitute an unanswerable endorsement of the stand taken by H. J. Heinz Company, and other reputable manufacturers, for strict purity, sound materials, and sanitation in the manufacture of food products.

In the face of these far-reaching opinions, will the Government protect the people, or must the public continue to endanger health by the use of drugged foods? Such foods are not only pronounced harmful because of a drug, but — as indicated by the resolutions — they permit the use of refuse and waste materials.

From drugged food there is only one protection — read labels carefully. The law demands that every article of food prepared with Benzoate of Soda must have that fact stated on the label. Look particularly for obscurely-placed fine type, making some such announcement as "Contains $\frac{1}{10}$ of one per cent. Benzoate of Soda."

Heinz Tomato Ketchup, Fruit Preserves, Sweet Pickles, Apple Butter, Mince Meat, etc., do not contain Benzoate of Soda or any artificial preservative. These — and all of Heinz 57 Varieties — are prepared from fresh, pure materials, by clean methods, in open-to-the-public, sanitary kitchens which are visited and inspected by thousands annually from every part of the world.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

MRS. PRESTON fell limply back in her chair. She could not speak. The boy waited impatiently, his eyes alight. At last Preston cleared his throat.

"But, Marco, do you quite understand—do you think you could—" he paused helplessly. A curious something in the boyish face opposite had stayed the words on his lips. The next moment he crossed the room and took from a closet a violin in its case. "I happen to have a violin here that I used to play myself a bit," he said. "Suppose you play a little for us now, Marco," he suggested, as steadily as he could. "Suppose you show us just what you can—do."

"Howard! Howard!" remonstrated Mrs. Preston, feebly.

If the boy heard her, he did not seem to understand. To the amazement of both the man and the woman, he opened the case, took out the violin, and began with a practised hand to prepare it for use. They noticed that he handled it lovingly, with tender fingers; but at the first long-drawn note of sweetness, they both came suddenly erect in their chairs.

If Marco had understood what was at stake, he could scarcely have done better. The violin was a rare one, a genuine Cremona. He did not know that, it is true; but he did know that in it he was finding music that was rare indeed. In five minutes he had lost himself in his playing, as he always did when he was deeply stirred.

Save for the music the room was breathlessly still. Over in the west the sun dropped out of sight, and the shadows deepened; but the man and the woman did not stir until, with a long sigh of ecstasy, the boy stopped playing.

"Whew! that fiddle's great!" he breathed.

Mrs. Preston sprang to her feet and held out both her hands.

"Boy, boy, do you know what you are?" she cried. "You're wonderful! You're a genius! Of course you'll play to-night! And you'll play just as you are, and we'll have the room darkened like this. You'll be 'The Minstrel of the Streets.' Oh, Howard, won't it be lovely? Howard, why don't you say something?"

"Because I—can't, mother," laughed the man, a bit unsteadily. "After all, perhaps you've—said it."

When Mrs. Preston had left the room, her son turned to the boy, who was still tenderly fingering the violin.

"Who taught you to play like that, Marco?" he asked.

"Mumsey, first. After that I jest played. Then two years ago there was an old man what lived where we did, an' he played bang-up, he did—orchestrys an' all that. He teached me pieces—lots of 'em, nicer'n mine, ye know, like this." And there floated out into the room the first sweet notes of the ever-familiar, ever-beautiful "Intermezzo."

For some time after the haunting strains had died into silence, Preston sat motionless; then he lifted his head.

"But how does it happen that you never played before—to me?" he questioned.

The boy's face hardened.

"I hain't done much at it for a year—till jest lately. Ye see, dad—well, dad made me play for his drinks, or else ter git money ter buy 'em with; an' I got so I—I 'most hated it." The boy hesitated, then went on fiercely. "'Course, dad had a right ter do it. I was his, an' if he wanted me to, I oughter done it. But I didn't like ter play—that way."

"Well, no, I should say not," affirmed Preston, grimly; then he added, with brisk cheerfulness: "But now suppose you play again to me, so that we may decide just what we'll want to-night. By the way, we'll have dinner here in the studio—just you and I—then you'll be here all ready for this evening, without having to go home."

"Won't that be great!" exulted Marco, as he raised his violin again to his chin. "Mebbe you'd like this now," he suggested. "It's kind o' slow like that 'ere Intermezer what the man learnt me." And he began to play.

The room was almost dark now. In the corner Preston scarcely breathed, so weirdly sweet was the melody that came out of the shadows where Marco stood. When the last strain had ceased, Preston drew a rapturous sigh.

"Good heavens, boy! and to think you've had all this locked up within you, and I didn't even guess it! What was that piece?"

"Did ye like it, really?" rejoiced Marco. "I like the slow ones, too; but most folks don't. They want the jigs what goes fast, most gen'rally."

"Liked it! Of course I liked it! But what is it?"

"'Tain't nothin', really, ye know; that is, it ain't printed on paper like real pieces. I only made it up long ago. It's 'Lost on the Ocean Wave'."

"You made it up! 'Lost on the Ocean Wave'!"

"Yes. I made up the music, an' Flossie made up the name. She liked it awful well—that piece."

"Who's Flossie?"

"My sister."

"Why, have you a sister Flossie, too? So have I."

"You have?—a sister Flossie, like me?" cried Marco.

"Well, her name is 'Florence,' and she isn't really a sister, I suppose," admitted the man. "She is the daughter of a dear friend of my mother, who died some years ago. She has lived with us a long time, and we all love her very dearly.

"But you've got your sister, an' I haven't. I lost her ages and ages ago," mourned Marco.

The man caught the sob in the low-pitched voice, and thought he understood: the little girl was dead, probably; he would remember, and would be very careful not to grieve the boy again by speaking of her. He would be sure, too, not to say much about their own little Florence. It might bring sad memories. Before he could speak, however, the door opened, and Mrs. Preston's voice cried in surprise:

"In the dark still?"

"Yes," laughed Preston, as he turned on the electric lights. "Fortunately our young artist here isn't confined to his notes."

"Of course he isn't, the dear child!—and that's all the better for my plans," cried Mrs. Preston. "Howard,

A Double Duty Fly Trap

PYRAMIDS mean fly protection as well as fly destruction. Hang them anywhere—on your chandeliers, near your pictures—wherever flies gather.

Pyramid Fly Catchers

Flypaper is confined to tables and stands—catches only the wandering fly—and its unclean, sticky surface is a constant menace to people's clothing, etc.

PYRAMIDS expose their surfaces slowly and automatically. Thus, their power of attraction is constantly renewed. Also, they have two gummed surfaces against flypaper's one—are doubly effective—more economical—last longer.

Try them. Write to-day, naming your grocer, and enclose 10 cents in stamps. Two PYRAMIDS will be sent by return mail.

THE STORY OF MARCO

I've the loveliest idea for his numbers! Come, I want to show it to you. We'll be back in a moment, my dear," she nodded to Marco, as she left the room. To her son she said:

"I'm a little disturbed about Florence. She wants to sit up this evening and hear the music. But I can't let her, of course. It'll be so late—and you know how excitable and nervous she is. I did right in saying no. Don't you think so?" she concluded anxiously.

"I do," agreed the man with decision.

"I told her she might leave her door open after she'd gone to bed, and then she could hear the music."

"Of course," rejoined the man. "That is much the better way."

CHAPTER XXVI

A Grand Surprise

THE great Preston mansion was ablaze with lights from basement to roof. Outside, a crawling line of carriages and motor-cars extended far down the avenue. Inside, the perfume of flowers, the flash of jewels, and the swish of silken draperies, together with the sound of gay voices and soft laughter, told that Mrs. Preston's musicale was to be a success, at least so far as the size and brilliancy of the audience were concerned. The far-famed, much-sought-after duchess and her party had arrived.

Everywhere there was an undercurrent of half-subdued excitement. Something was in the air—something mysterious and delightful. Morenski was not coming; everyone knew that—and everyone was disappointed. Yet with the disappointment came a curious elation. There was to be something—somebody, to take his place—a surprise. And most of the guests knew Mrs. Preston and her "surprises" of old; — they, therefore, awaited this one with eagerness.

Finally the last motor car crept to the door, the last silken drapery swished into silence—and the music began.

There was a piano solo, perfunctorily played, and perfunctorily applauded. Then a male quartette appeared. The applause swelled to an encore this time. The third number on the programme aroused a great deal of enthusiasm. It was a song by a diva noted for her beauty, her voice, and the almost prohibitory price that she set on her services for an occasion like this.

One by one the artists appeared, made their bows, and retired only to reappear later; and still tantalizing suspense hovered over the politely listening guests. Then there came a pause—so long a pause that the eager hum of voices unconsciously hushed itself into silence.

Suddenly the audience became aware that the lights were growing dim. Breathlessly the throng watched until the great music-room was almost in darkness, save where a startled eye or a flashing jewel caught a gleam from some half-hidden electric light. The silence grew more intense as every gaze turned toward the slowly parting curtains that hung before the great alcove window at the end of the room. Then a long-drawn "o-oh!" of delight swept the waiting throng, and Mrs. Preston knew that she had won.

In the alcove, every blind and shade and curtain had been removed, leaving the great plate-glass windows on all sides free and clear. The music-room was at the top of the house, and the windows looked out now on a huge half-dome of velvety blue-gray sky, flecked with stars, high among which floated the silver disk of the moon. In the alcove, with the moonlight full upon him, stood a boy, thin-faced and ill-clad, with a violin at his chin. Then a voice from somewhere announced: "The Minstrel of the Streets," and the boy began to play.

Downstairs, a certain little girl who had tried very hard for a long while to keep awake heard the first strains, and drowsily blinked her eyes. For some time she listened rapturously. It was beautiful music, and on it she seemed to float away—away—far up into the sky, where the stars and the angels were; away—away—and she did float quite away to sleep, long before the playing had ceased.

In the music-room there was the rapt silence of amazed appreciation. According to the prearranged plan, Marco was passing from one piece to another, much as he liked to play when alone. So far as he himself was concerned, indeed, he was alone. He knew, to be sure, that in the room before him there were men and women listening. But he had not seen them, and they only loomed now ghostlike out of the shadows. Besides, he had half turned so that he might look out of the window at the moon and the far-away stars, and he was playing to them. He finished, in accordance with Preston's suggestion, with "Lost on the Ocean Wave."

As the last strains quivered into silence, there was the supreme tribute of a breathless hush; then the applause burst like a thunderclap, and a storm of excited voices swept the room. The next instant the lights flashed on, and a dark-eyed, dark-haired, very much embarrassed boy looked around for a means of escape.

He had been greatly distressed from the first over his clothes. He regretted exceedingly that Mrs. Preston insisted on his wearing the ragged suit in which he posed for her son. His own garments, worn every day, were poor enough, certainly, he thought; but they would have been infinitely better than these rags. He felt now worse than ever to be in the bright light, and with those richly dressed men and women all staring at him and clapping their hands. He decided to get away at once, and with that end in view he made a dive for the nearest door. But his old expertness in dealing with crowds must have deserted him, for he found himself entangled in a cloud of spangled tulle that seemed to float around a very pretty young lady, who was holding out both her hands to him and exclaiming, "Oh—you—dear!"

A long hour afterward Preston found the boy hiding behind one of the pictures in the darkest corner of the studio.

"Well, my boy, you may come out," he laughed.

"Be they gone?" Marco's eyes were wide and cautious.

"All gone."

"My, but they was corkers!" cried the boy, stiffly crawling from his hiding place. "Why, they hugged me—hugged me!—them ladies did."

Preston chuckled, but he answered gravely:

"They liked your music, Marco."

"And they trun flowers at me, an' smoothed my hair, an'—an' kissed me, Mr. Preston. They kissed me!"

The man laughed.

"I'm afraid you don't half appreciate your blessings," he said. "There's many a man who would give much for one of those kisses that you scorned."

"Huh? Well, mebbe," admitted Marco, doubtfully. "But I wouldn't."

Half an hour later came the end of that wonderful day—an end so marvelous that Marco quite pinched himself to make sure he was awake. Beside no less a personage than the Preston chauffeur, and in no less a vehicle than the Preston motor-car, he made the journey to the humble little home where he worked for his board.

THE NEW WOMAN
Made Over by Quitting Coffee

Coffee probably wrecks a greater percentage of Southerners than of Northern people for Southerners use it more freely.

The work it does is distressing enough in some instances; as an illustration, a woman of Richmond, Va., writes:

"I was a coffee drinker for years and for about six years my health was completely shattered. I suffered fearfully with headaches and nervousness, also palpitation of the heart and loss of appetite.

"My sight gradually began to fail and finally I lost the sight of one eye altogether. The eye was operated upon and the sight partially restored, then I became totally blind in the other eye.

"My doctor used to urge me to give up coffee but I was wilful and continued to drink it until finally in a case of severe illness the doctor insisted that I must give up coffee, so I began using Postum and in a month I felt like a new creature.

"I steadily gained in health and strength. About a month ago I began using Grape-Nuts food and the effect has been wonderful. I really feel like a new woman and have gained about 25 pounds.

"I am quite an elderly lady and before using Postum and Grape-Nuts I could not walk a square without exceeding fatigue, now I walk ten or twelve without feeling it. Formerly in reading I could remember but little but now my memory holds fast what I read.

"Several friends who have seen the remarkable effects of Postum and Grape-Nuts on me have urged that I give the facts to the public for the sake of suffering humanity, so, although I dislike publicity, you can publish this letter if you like."

PHILO SYSTEM

WHICH IS ESPECIALLY VALUABLE TO THE FARMER AS WELL AS THE CITY OR VILLAGE FANCIER, AND IS ADAPTED TO ALL CLIMATES. ALL BREEDS AND ALL PEOPLE!

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry

And in many respects is just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible and getting unheard of results that are hard to believe without seeing. However, the facts remain the same, and we can prove to you during the next three months every word of the above statement.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success

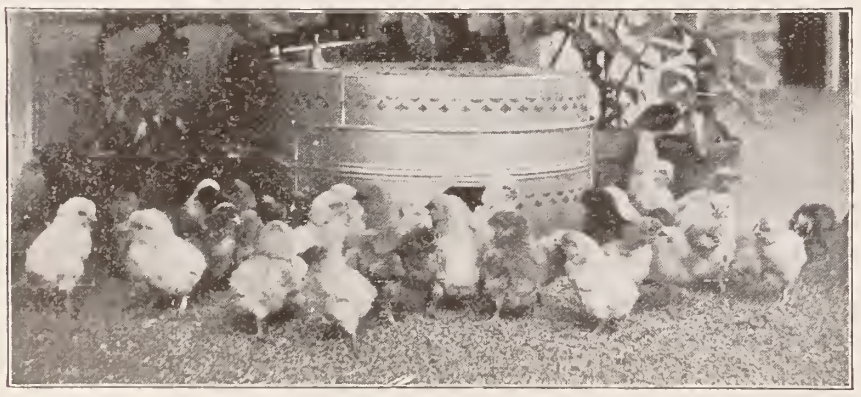
From selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business, and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner. There is nothing complicated about the work, and any man, woman or child that can handle a saw and hammer can do the work.

Two-Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks

Are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here 3c. per pound above the highest market price.

Our Six-Months-Old Pullets are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month

In a space of two square feet for each bird. No green-cut bone or meat of any description is fed, and the food is inexpensive as compared with food others are using. Our new book, The Philo-System of Progressive Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and fifteen pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish. It also tells how to make a brooder for 25 cents that will automatically keep all lice off the chickens or kill any that may be on them when in the brooders.



"A Trick of the Trade"

Fully one-third of all the chickens ready to hatch die in the shell. After thirty years of study and practice we have discovered a simple way to save every chick that is fully developed and ready to hatch, whether the egg is pipped or not. This, we believe, is one of the lost arts of the ancient Egyptians. It takes but a minute to save a chick and no skill is required.

Our New Brooder Saves 2c. On Each Chicken

No lamp is required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all lice off the chickens automatically, or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of from 25 to 50 cents.

Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y. Bellefontaine, Ohio, June 7, '09.

Dear Sir: I just want to tell you of the success I have had with the Philo System. In January, 1909, I purchased one of your Philo System books and I commenced to hatch chickens. On the third day of February, 1909, I succeeded in hatching ten chicks. I put them in one of your Fireless Brooders, and we had zero weather. We succeeded in bringing through nine—one got killed by accident. On June 1, one of the pullets laid her first egg, and the most remarkable thing is she has laid every day since up to the present time.

E. R. Philo, Publisher, Elmira, N.Y. Baltimore, Md., May 28, 1909.

Dear Sir: I have embarked in the poultry business on a small scale (Philo System) and am having the best of success so far, sixty-eight per cent of eggs hatched by hens, all chicks alive and healthy at this writing; they are now three weeks old. Mr. Philo is a public benefactor, and I do not think his System can be improved upon, and so I am now looking for more yard room, having but 15x30 feet where I am now.

Yours truly, C. H. Leach.
205 S. Clinton Street.

Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y. Osakis, Minn., June 7, '09.

Dear Sir: You certainly have the greatest System the world has ever known. I have had experience with poultry, but I know you have the System that brings the real profits.

Yours, Jesse Underwood.

Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y. South Britain, Conn., Ap. 14, 1909.

Dear Sir: I have followed your system as close as I could; the result is a complete success. If there can be any improvement on nature, your Brooder is it. When I took my chicks out of the Hatcher I had it set up near a stove. You see, I trap-nest all my breeding stock and also toe-punch, so I had to open up quite often to get the right mark on the right chick. The first experience I had with your System was last December. I hatched 17 chicks under two hens, put them as soon as hatched in one of your Brooders out of doors, and at the age of about three months I sold them at 35c. a pound. They then averaged 2½ lbs. each, and the man I sold them to said they were the finest he ever saw, and he wants all I can spare this season. Yours truly, A. E. Nelson.

The upper photograph shows her at her dock in Amsterdam. The lower shows her being towed to Rotterdam before shipping her for the United States.

Questions and Answers

B. J., Harrisburg, Pa. 1. What countries have an income tax? 2. What is the minimum income affected by our proposed income tax? 3. What is the real reason for an income tax at the present time, financial or simply political?

1. Austria taxes all incomes over $112, the rates ranging from 8 to 20 per cent., according to the size of the income; Prussia, all incomes over 900 marks, rates 1 to 4 per cent.; Italy, incomes over $77.20, rates from 4 to 12 per cent.; Holland, incomes over $260, rates 2 to 3 1-5 per cent.; Switzerland, incomes over $100, rates 1 to 8 per cent.; England, incomes over $750, rates 2 per cent. and upward. 2. Incomes not exceeding $5,000 to be exempt. 3. It is claimed by its advocates that it is the only available means of meeting the deficit in the budget for 1910 and 1911. For ten years, in Civil War times, we had a tax of 3½ to 10 per cent. on incomes over $600; some of the exemptions, however, ranging up to $2,000.

Subscriber, Kansas. 1. Is it right to make wishes by means of the Bible, and expect them to be answered? 2. What are the rules for achieving popularity?

1. You probably mean, is it right to make wishes and open the Bible at random for an answer? The custom may not be wicked, but it is surely foolish and superstitious. 2. Few achieve popularity by aiming at it. Do your duty, make all around you happy, take pains to be as neat and attractive as possible, and try not to think whether you are liked or not. The proverb says, "He that showeth himself friendly hath many friends." We cannot answer your other question. Consult a physician.

M. M., Trenton, N. J. In the search of the Sultan's palace, was the hidden treasure found?

The search resulted in the discovery of gold, in three safes, amounting to 90,000 pounds, Turkish (equal to about $400,000), and a large quantity of jewelry, including a pearl necklace valued at 74,000 pounds, Turkish ($330,000), and bank notes to the amount of 540,000 pounds, Turkish ($2,400,000). A large valise was found, filled with the reports of spies, which showed how extensive and complete was the Sultan's system of espionage.

Mrs. A. B. J., Cisco, Texas. Is it Emma Willard or Frances E. Willard who has a place in the Hall of Fame?

Emma Willard, the great educator, has a tablet in the Hall of Fame. Frances E. Willard has not. There are no statues there. Only those who have been dead ten years, before a given vote, are eligible.

C. W., Kansas. What are the duties of a proof-reader, and what education is necessary?

A proof-reader should have, at the beginning, a thorough common school education, besides a practical knowledge of the printing trade. Proof-readers who are not printers are always handicapped by this lack. The proof-reader must acquire skill by actual experience; he must learn the peculiarities of different dictionaries, and he will absorb a fund of valuable practical information. It is not a business that can be acquired except by actual experience.

L. N., Springfield, Mass. Can any of your readers say how many of the members of the Lammermuir party are still alive? This missionary party left London May 26, 1866, with twenty-six members on board, and landed in Shanghai September 30, 1866.

Perhaps some reader of THE MAIL-BAG may be able to give the desired information.

W. H. H., Gastonia, N. C. When a soldier is killed in battle, is he saved through, or by reason of, his martyrdom?

Patriotism is one of the greatest of virtues. "Sweet it is to die for one's country," and the grateful plaudits of posterity are lifted in honor of a nation's heroes who have given their lives for others. It is beyond question, however, that war, with all that relates to it, is a curse upon the world. There are many Christian soldiers, and alas! many who are not, but who take up the military profession for its excitement. Thus it may well be reckoned that all who die on the battlefield are not martyrs. Your true patriot, however, is a martyr, and well deserving of all good things here and hereafter. It is better for us not to judge, but to trust these matters in God's hands.

W. S. L., Dunnegan, Mo. 1. Are the Armenians Christians? 2. Why are they called Armenians? 3. Do any of the Moslems go to the missionary schools?

1. Yes, of the Gregorian Church, which is their own national Christian Church. 2. Armenia is the ancient name of their native country, but it has lately been changed to Anatolia by the Turks. 3. Yes, but not in any considerable numbers.

Mrs. B. McD., Des Moines, Ia. What is petrol butter?

It is the latest product of petroleum, and is now said to have been perfected after several years' experimentation. It tastes like ordinary butter, but is brownish in color; it keeps well, and does not become rancid.

W. F. F., Fox, Colo. 1. What church or churches should a person join, if he or she wants to profess Christ? There are many different religions, yet they each claim to be the right church. 2. Did the Missionary Baptist Church start since Christ and the apostles were on earth?

1. There is no church or denomination that holds a monopoly of Christian truth. You should unite, preferably, with the church of your parents; but if that is not convenient, any one of the Protestant denominational bodies may be chosen. While Christian churches may differ in the matter of church government and in other minor details, they all hold the same Gospel unto salvation. 2. Neither the Baptist Church, nor any other denominational Christian church, was in existence when Christ was on earth. They were all founded long afterward.

W. T. C., Centreville, Tex. Harmonize the command to repent, found in Matt. 4:17, with the statement in Acts 11:18, that repentance is the gift of God. If it is not in the power of a person to repent, why is the command given?

Grace reigns at every stage of man's religious progress. When we set our faces Godward, with contrite hearts, he will abundantly pardon, thus divinely sealing (or granting) the fullest repentance "unto life," which means more than mere pardon. It means pardon, with all grace added, to make us fit for eternal life. The better rendering of the phrase in the original would be "repentance whose proper issue is life."

U. R. B., East Jordan, Mich. Please give three mottoes suitable for a dining-room.

We suggest the following: 1. "Better is a dinner of herbs, where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith" (Prov. 15:17). 2. "Whatever ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (I. Cor. 10:31). 3. "Back of the loaf is the snowy flour
Back of the flour, the mill;
Back of the mill is the wheat and the shower,
The sun and the Father's will."
—MALTBIE D. BABCOCK.

Mrs. L. A. L., Ocean Park, Calif. Kindly explain the meaning of the passage Mark 4:12. I thought Christ wished every one to hear and understand, and be converted.

See the related passages (Matt. 13:10, 11). Jesus explained that he spoke in parables when he desired to address those who had already come into the life of the kingdom. These parables the worldly minded, having their spiritual eyes still unopened, could not understand. They had rejected his message, and attributed his miracles to Satanic power, at a time when the truth was clearly set before them. Now, "by a fixed law of the divine administration, the duty men voluntarily refuse to do, they at length become morally incapable of doing." (See Isa. 6:9, 10.) Worldliness blinds men to the truth. In Matt. 13:16, 17, Jesus describes, by way of contrast, the happy condition of those who opened their hearts to the divine message.

Mrs. C. A. P., Appleton, Wis. Kindly explain Matt. 10:34-36.

Jesus was speaking in prophetic figure. He was warning them of the strife, discord and conflict that would arise, of the deadly opposition the Gospel would encounter and of the fact that this hostility would affect and even rend asunder the dearest ties. (See Luke 12:51-53.) In verse 36 he probably foreshadowed the treachery of Judas, of "his own household."

G. W., Potomac, Mont. What is the proportion of preachers' sons, compared with others, that make bad men? How is it that "the minister's boy" has such a bad reputation?

No statistics are available to show how many ministers' sons, compared with others, turn out well. Watch the papers for a few years, and keep a record of the ministers' sons mentioned there, at the same time noting similar facts in books. Among distinguished contemporaries the Wrights, the aviators, are the sons of a minister. So is Richard W. Gilder, the editor and poet. Henry Ward Beecher was a minister's son. The old proverb about "ministers' sons" is chiefly intended as a joke.

W. H. M., Olney, Texas. Is the Christian Endeavor Society a denominational organization?

No; it originated in a Congregational Church, but every effort has been made to keep it non-sectarian. Your other questions are not clear. Can you not express them more plainly?

Mrs. E. S., Edmond, Okla. Did Harriet Beecher Stowe ever say that she was sorry she had written Uncle Tom's Cabin, and that it had done more harm than good?

There is a story that during the Civil War, when Mrs. Stowe saw the horrible bloodshed and sorrow and was told that Uncle Tom's Cabin had brought them on, she expressed regret that she had written it. She must have seen that the final outcome was good.

A Subscriber, New York. A Pennsylvania druggist sells poison without a prescription; several suicides have resulted. Is this right?

The law in New York State forbids such sales, and there is probably a similar law in Pennsylvania, under which this druggist can be prosecuted. The matter should be followed up in the town where he lives.

King Alfonso of Spain, Who is Now Facing a Revolution

DISASTER has followed the Spanish arms in Morocco. After a series of skirmishes between the Spanish troops and the Riffian tribesmen, the latter have won an important battle at Melilla, killing and wounding 3,000 Spaniards and driving the King's troops back to the city walls, where fighting was still going on at last accounts. The Spanish General Pintos, five captains, two lieutenant-colonels and many other officers were among the slain. Two other generals were mortally wounded. This crushing defeat abroad was followed by anarchy, rioting and civil war at home. The people rebelled against the unpopular Moorish war, and bitterly opposed the sending out of more troops. Barcelona's streets were filled with riotous mobs, and troops and cannon were used in a vain attempt to disperse them and restore order. There are indications of a general insurrection which may threaten the throne, and grave fears are felt for the safety of King Alfonso and the royal family. There was talk of a movement in Barcelona to proclaim a provisional government.

Miscellaneous

M. G. T., Baltimore, Md. The general custom is for the preacher not to make any charge for conducting funeral services, but in all cases where he is put to expense, or has to come from a distance, it is proper that he should be paid.

A. W., Parnassus, Pa., and some others, have kindly informed us in regard to a recent statement in THE MAIL-BAG that Pittsburg and Allegheny are now one municipality and elected one Mayor for Greater Pittsburg in February.

W. P. H., Yorkville, Va. The Apostles' Creed was designed as a general rule, or exposition, covering the essentials of belief in the early Church. The passage in Matt.. 7:12 is the famous summary of the law of human love and brotherly kindness.

J. C., Rochester, N. H. 1. Question concerning Jeremiah and the Ark answered recently in MAIL-BAG. 2. There is no evidence that the children of Korah were included in the punishment which overtook the leaders of the conspiracy in the wilderness. Ex. 6:24 mentions three of his sons whose descendants afterward bore a prominent part in the Levitical service.

R. E. B., Winfield, Kan. Christianity rules out malice and substitutes brotherly love; it prefers simplicity to showy display; it discourages litigation; it is generous in its judgment of others; it overlooks many faults; it is unselfish; it inspires us with a desire to help others and to visit and cheer the sick and comfort the sorrowing. It is not boastful, but rather modest.

B. J., Duluth, Minn. The oldest human remains, according to scientists, are those found by Dr. Schoetensack, a German investigator, near Heidelberg. They were the remains of a fossil man of the lower quaternary period. The jawbone and teeth are well preserved, and much stronger and heavier than modern bones. It must be added, however, that some of the scientists doubt whether the remains are really human.

Tents in the Jordan Valley

By Prof. M. P. YOUNG, Assiut College, Egypt

NO valley in the world can compare with that of the Jordan in sacredness of interest and peculiarity of structure. Most natural waterways are channels having a steady downward trend and are characterized by shady glades and smoothly-flowing rivers, running merrily to the sea. Not so with the Jordan valley. It had its birth amid the violent tremor of the terrible convulsions that shook Palestine to its very core, and its course is one onward downward rush, through regions of barren and bleak desolation, until it finally terminates in a sea of stagnation and death 1,300 feet below sea level. Rising at the foot of Hermon, at the height of 1,090 feet above sea level, it runs a zigzag course of 225 miles, 190 of which are below sea level. Throughout the vast depressed area it runs steadily downward, except where it is caught in two depressions: the first forming Lake Huleh, and the second, at a depth of 682 feet, forming the Sea of Galilee. It runs in a deeply-cut channel, giving not a sign of life to any part of the valley as it runs its long course of 185 miles between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea.

It springs, full born, from the bowels of Hermon, and around its head are scattered Palestine's wildest profusion of poplar and elm and maple. The ice-cold river goes gushing over stones and tumbling over precipices, little conscious of the deep and yawning chasm of stagnation into which it is soon to be buried forever. Over all this scene of ice-cold stream and gushing cataract, of matted vines and stately elm, snow-capped Hermon rises in quiet solitude and lends an air of dignity and everlasting strength.

In this sanctuary of the gods the earliest wanderers of the sons of Ishmael bowed, realizing that they were in the presence of some awful power. At a later date, the Greeks, when led to the same place, were awed by the mighty river that came bursting forth from Hermon, and at once erected a sacred shrine to the god of the "waters under the earth." Philip, the tetrarch, was also drawn hither, and in the midst of the sacred sanctuary built his marble city, Cæsarea Philippi. Only once do we have an account of Christ visiting it, and it was while in this place, with Hermon overhead, that he said to Peter, "Thou art a rock."

Nowhere does the Jordan have more sacred associations than the second little lake in which it is caught—the Sea of Galilee. The green hills of Galilee slope gently down into the lake, and from all sides there creep in a thousand little brooklets. It was from these green hills of Galilee that the ancient multitude came down to the sea on their busy errands of commerce. Here the busy Galilean fishermen toiled day and night, catching not only

A SERMON FOR THE YOUNG BY

WHAT A CHILD CAN DO

TEXT—II. Kings 5:1-3

HOW many of you children like to hear stories? Hold up your hands. Now, I am going to ask you another question. Now, be honest, how many of you like to hear sermons? Well, there are not nearly so many hands, but I am going to preach you a sermon, and it is going to be full of stories. The subject of my sermon is "What a Child Can Do." Now some folks think that a child cannot do anything except laugh and cry, and run and shout, and jump and make a disturbance generally; but that is not so. Boys and girls can do just as important things in their way as great grown-up men and women can in their way. Children are just as important as grown-up folks. I am going to tell you to-day some of the things a child can do. I have a great long text, but it is a very interesting one, because it is about a little girl. (II. Kings 5:1-3.)

General Naaman's Trouble

Naaman was the greatest general of his day. When I was over in England, I used to ask the children who was the greatest general in the world. Some would shout Lord Roberts, and some would shout Lord Kitchener, and some Lord Wolseley, and more still would shout General Buller, and sometimes some one would shout General Booth. But if I had asked in Damascus a crowd of boys and girls who was the greatest general of the day, there would have been just one loud shout, "General Naaman." There was no difference of opinion. And when Naaman went driving down the streets in his chariot, the boys would toss their caps in the air (if they had caps, which they didn't) and shout, "Hurrah for Naaman!" One day Naaman looked into the palm of his hand, and there he saw a reddish-white spot. He said, "I don't like the looks of that. I wonder what that spot is."

The next day he looked again, and the spot was a little larger and a little deeper. He said, "I don't like the looks of that at all. I wonder what that spot is." He looked the next day, and the spot was still larger and still deeper. He went to the doctor and said, "Doctor, what is that spot in my hand?" And the doctor took his microscope (if he had one, which he didn't), and said, "General Naaman, I am awfully sorry to tell you, but that is the leprosy." And a great horror came into Naaman's heart, for the leprosy was the most awful disease any one ever had. There was no curing it. When a man had the leprosy, he had to leave home. He had to leave his wife and children, and had to be shut up in a house by himself. And the leprosy would spread, and his fingers would drop off; then part of his arm would drop off; then it would come out in his feet and his toes would drop off; then his feet would drop off and part of his leg. It would break out in his face, and his nose and ears would drop off, and then it would blind his eyes, and no wonder that when the doctor said, "Naaman, you have the leprosy," a great horror came into his heart. He went home and said, "I have got to leave you, wife. I cannot kiss you and the children. I have got to go away. I have the leprosy."

The Little Slave Girl

A great darkness fell over that home, but there was a little girl in that home. Naaman once, when he made a raid up in Israel, had gone to the city of Samaria and had taken a good many of the people captive. One was a little Israelitish girl. When he came back he gave this little girl to his wife, and said, "You can have this little girl for a slave girl." Though she was only a slave girl, she had a loving heart. She loved her mistress and her master, and when she heard that her master had the leprosy she ran in to Lady Naaman and said, "I do wish that Lord Naaman would go down to Samaria; for there is a great prophet of God down there, who would cure him of his leprosy." And Naaman drove down to Samaria, but he did not go to the prophet. He thought the king was the one that could cure him. He went and wanted the king to come out and cure him of his leprosy, but it frightened the king, for he thought General Naaman was simply trying to pick a quarrel with him.

But the prophet sent up word, "You send him down to me, and I will cure him of his leprosy." General Naaman drove down to the prophet's humble home in his chariot, and he thought Elisha would come out and bow before him and wave his hand over the leprosy, but Elisha never stirred. He just sent a servant out and said, "You go tell General Naaman to go down to the river Jordan and dip seven times in the Jordan, and when he comes up the seventh time his leprosy will be healed." Naaman was very angry and said, "I thought he would come out and see me. I thought he would wave his hand up and down over the leprosy, but he only says, 'Go and wash in the Jordan.' I won't do it." Then he said, "We have two beautiful rivers in Damascus, and they are worth more than all the muddy streams of Samaria. Are not Abana and Pharpar better than all the waters of Israel? I won't go and wash in Jordan." He started to drive home. One of his servants said, "Master, if the prophet had told thee to do some hard thing, wouldst thou not have done it? How much more, then, when he saith unto thee a simple thing, 'Go wash and be clean.'"

Naaman Listens

And General Naaman listened to reason, and he went and dipped down underneath the Jordan once, and he came up; the leprosy was just as bad as ever. Dipped the second time, and came up just as full of leprosy as ever, and the third time; leprosy just as bad as ever. The fourth time, just as bad as ever. The fifth time, just as bad as ever. The sixth time, just as much leprosy as ever. I suppose he then said, "What is the use of all this; I have been down six times, and I am just as bad as ever." Then he went down again, and when he came up the leprosy was all gone and his flesh was just as white and smooth as that of a little child. Who did more for Naaman than anybody else in the whole country? That little girl. She told him where to go and be cured. I guess children can do something, don't you? That little girl was the most important one in Naaman's household.

I want to tell you five things that any boy or any girl, or any young man or any young woman, can do.

I. A child can become a true Christian. A great many people don't think so. When they see boys and girls standing up in the meeting, and coming down front, they say, "These children don't know what they are doing. A little child like that cannot become a true Christian." What did Jesus say? Yes, that's it. Jesus said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Convert at 9, Martyr at 95

Years and years ago, way over in western Asia, there was a great city called Smyrna, and in that city a noble Christian lived. His name was Polycarp. He was ninety-five years old. He was the bishop of the church in Smyrna. He had a great long white beard hanging down over his breast, and great long white hair hanging over his shoulders. Everybody loved him. He was such a noble man. A new governor came to that city, and he made up his mind he would stamp out Christianity and he started a great persecution. This Roman governor said, "I am going to crush Christianity out of this city." Somebody came to him and said, "Governor, if you are going to crush Christianity in Smyrna, you had better begin with Polycarp, for he is the finest Christian in Smyrna." He said, "Where is he?" But Polycarp was not in the city. He had retired to the country. They sent out after him and dragged him back to Smyrna, and they brought him into the presence of the Roman governor. When Polycarp was brought before him the governor said, Polycarp, they tell me you are a Christian." "Yes, I am." "Well," said the Roman governor, "you will have to give up Christianity and Christ." Polycarp said he could not do it. "If you don't," said the Roman governor, "I will throw you to the lions." Polycarp said, no, he could not deny his Lord. The governor said, "Polycarp, if you don't renounce Christianity, I will have them take you out and burn you at the stake." And old Polycarp stood there, with his long white beard hanging down on his breast and his long white hair hanging over his shoulders, and he said, "These eighty and six years have I served Him and he has never done me harm; I cannot deny my Lord and Master now." The Roman governor said, "Take him out and burn him at the stake," and they tied Polycarp to a stake and the people picked up fagots and piled them up all around him, and the fire got hotter and hotter until Polycarp's flesh began to ache, but a radiant smile came to the face of old Polycarp as he stood there with the long white beard hanging over his breast, and he cried, "Welcome, cross of Christ. Welcome, eternal life." And Polycarp's spirit departed to be with the Saviour. How old was Polycarp when he died? Yes, that's right; ninety-five. How long had he served Christ? Yes, eighty-six years. How old was Polycarp when he was converted? Nine years old. That shows whether a boy can become a Christian or not. And all the good people don't die young either, do they? He lived to be ninety-five. That isn't very young!

Children as Church Members

II. A child can live a beautiful Christian life. A great many people don't think so. They think when a boy or girl accepts Christ that it doesn't mean much. But a child can live just as beautiful a life as an old man or an old woman. When I was in Bristol, England, and when I was in Australia, many boys and girls accepted Jesus, and I would get letters from their fathers and mothers and teachers telling me what beautiful lives these boys and girls were leading. Once, out in Kansas, a little girl was converted. She went to her father and said, "Father, I want to unite with the church." He said, "Why do you want to unite with the church, my child? You are just as good as you can be now. You are almost an angel." "Yes," she said, "but Jesus died for me, and Jesus commands me to partake of the bread and wine in remembrance of him, and I want to unite with the church." So he took her to the minister. The minister examined her and found she had really been converted, and received her into the church. After she had been in the church a while her father went around and said, "Minister, I want to join your church, too." "Yes," said the minister, "all right, but please tell me why you want to join the church." "You remember," said the father, "I brought my little girl to you a while ago. Well, I thought before my little girl joined the church she was just as good as she could be. She seemed to be almost an angel, but she has been so much better since that I thought if Jesus could do so much for her he could do something for her father, too."

You, boys and girls, can take Jesus to-day. You can go home and be so much more obedient to your parents, and so much more kind and thoughtful to everybody in every way, so much better about your study and your play that people will say, "If Jesus can do so much for this boy, this girl, I want him too."

The Prayers of a Child

III. I will tell you a third thing a child can do—pray. Praying is the greatest thing that anybody can do. Praying is the greatest thing a grown man can do. Why, do you know what happens when you and I pray? We just put out the finger of our prayer and touch the mighty arm of God. There is not much strength in that finger, but when I put out my finger the great, mighty arm of God moves to do its work. When I was a boy I lived in Brooklyn, N. Y. Brooklyn is on Long Island and New York City is on Manhattan Island, and between these islands there used to be a very swift current, and there were a great many rocks in the current. The current would catch a vessel and fling it on the rocks and wreck the vessel. Do you know what they called that dangerous channel? "Hell Gate." I used to have to go down through that channel. My steamboat left New York at midnight, and every time we had to go through Hell Gate I never went to bed until we had passed that place, for I did not know but my boat might go on the rocks. As soon as we got near, ten or fifteen sailors would come up on deck with a long pole and run it into an auxiliary tiller, and they would just lean right over and pull until we passed that place. If the boat swerved to enough to satisfy their simple needs, but also enough to enter into an extensive commerce with the Roman world. It was in the immortal little village of Magdala that some of Christ's sweetest messages were spoken, and it was in bigoted and powerful Bethsaida and Capernaum that Christ's mission and power were most clearly shown.

Leaving Galilee, the vegetation becomes scattered and in a few miles the scene is one of entire desolation. Its distance to the Dead Sea is 185 miles; by an air-line it is only 60 miles. The course winds in and out among bleak and barren mounds of clay. The slipping or falling of one of these can easily account for the "drying up" of the Jordan in the days of the children of Israel. A few muddy paths descend down into the river. Thousands of Greek and Russian pilgrims come down from Judea over these clayey roads, to be baptized in the sacred stream. Around the lower end of its course the dampness of the Dead Sea begins to penetrate the land, and everything is one low, marshy area of salt. As soon as the Jordan flows into the Dead Sea all forms of life at once perish; nothing has yet been found that can survive in this terrible cesspool. The schoolboy idea that no bird can fly across it, on account of the vapid and stagnating air, is a mistaken one. Of no lake is this true, but the Dead Sea is not the saltiest lake. The ocean is estimated as having 4 per cent. of salt, the Dead Sea 26¼ per cent., and Lake Elton of the Volga 29 per cent. Strewn all around the lake are the trunks of dead trees and broken limbs, in which all signs of life are gone. Over the whole of the lake there goes up a constant cloud of mist, and the surface is characterized by a deep haze. This great evaporation accounts for the heavy dews of Palestine, which are the only supply of water upon which the scanty crops of Judea, Idumea and Samaria can depend. The early Israelites, in their simple Arab nature, looked upon this vast depression with awe, and described its great clouds of vapor that are constantly rising as the "smoke that goeth up forever."

Bethsaida, on Lake Galilee

The Yarmuk, a Tributary of the Jordan

Although the valley is one of the most desolate on earth yet there are a few springs around which an abundance of vegetation is found. Wherever a drop of water is to be found the vegetation is profuse, the two essentials for growth being at work in full force—heat and water. Around such springs as these are built the few cities that are to be found in the valley. It was around such that the ancient city of Jericho once stood. With such a meagre supply of water all such cities were built only for a day. There is not a single account in history of Jericho ever withstanding an attack.

The references that are made in Scripture to the valley are always of drought, desolation and death. Even in the time of the new dispensation the old cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were still regarded as being in a land upon which God's wrath rested in a most peculiar way. In the vision of Ezekiel we have the influence of Christianity pictured as a stream that rises in the temple area, flowing through the valley of the Kidron and the desert Judean hills, and at last forcing itself into the Dead Sea, where "the waters shall be healed," and there shall be an abundance of fish, even as "the fish of the great sea," the Mediterranean.

To-day the Jordan lives in the religious feeling and expression of all people throughout Christendom. With some it excites so deep a devotion that long pilgrimages are made in order to be baptized in its sacred waters; with others, it lives in song as the last narrow boundary that separates us from the "land of the blessed."

WHAT A CHILD CAN DO

the right or to the left, we would have gone on the rocks and been wrecked. Well, there were so many wrecks there that at last they made up their minds to clear out Hell Gate. For days and weeks and months they tunneled underneath those rocks, then they laid in powder and other explosives and ran a wire up to an office in New York City. To this wire was attached an electric battery and a button. Some one was going to push this button, and an electric spark would go through the wire and set fire to the powder and Hell Gate would be blown up. I was seventy-two miles away that day. It was blown up on a Sunday afternoon, so there would be no traffic going through, and though I was seventy-two miles away we were listening for the explosion, for it would be so great we thought we could hear it seventy-two miles away. Now, who do you suppose touched that button? Some big man? No, a little girl, the daughter of the chief engineer. She was to touch the button at three o'clock. She took her seat in front of the button at ten minutes to three, and began watching the clock—ten minutes to three, nine minutes to three, eight minutes to three, seven minutes to three, six minutes to three, five minutes to three, four minutes to three, three minutes to three, two minutes to three, one minute to three, three o'clock, touched the button, the spark went through the wire, the powder went off, and Hell Gate went up. Who blew up Hell Gate? That little girl. Just a little bit of a wee girl, but she blew out all those dangerous rocks. When you and I pray we touch something more mighty than an electric button. We touch the mighty arm of God, and the mighty arm of God moves to do its marvelous work.

When I lived up in Minneapolis there was a mission. One night a man stood out at the door. Up the street there came an Englishman. He was a stonecutter, and could make $4.25 a day when he worked, but he wouldn't work very much and spent a good deal of time in the saloon when he ought to be working. He was a gambler, too. His family lived down on the East Side Flats. He used to go down to the Tenth Avenue bridge, and stand on that bridge and think he would fling himself overboard into the Mississippi River, that ran underneath far below. The man who stood out in the front of the mission spoke to this drunken Englishman as he passed by and said, "There is a Gospel meeting going on inside. Everybody welcome. Won't you go in?" "Go inside a Gospel meeting? Go away with you. I don't want your Gospel meeting!" He went up the street mad and cursing.

Sunday afternoon came a little girl ten years of age, little Annie B——, up Washington Avenue. There was a Sunday School going on, and a lady asked her if she didn't want to go to Sunday School. She said, "Won't you come in, little girl? We have a Sunday School inside. We have beautiful singing and a nice class. Won't you come in?" I don't think Annie had ever been in a Sunday School, but she went in. After they had sung some beautiful hymns, the teacher took her Bible and taught her about Jesus, and little ten-year-old Annie B—— took Jesus. Then she went home and told her mother what she had done and her mother took Jesus, and she told some of her brothers and sister and they took Jesus. She had an Uncle Joe—her father's name was Joe, too. His name was Joe B——. Her uncle's name was Joe C——. And her Uncle Joe took Jesus. Her grandpa and her grandma took Jesus, but her father wouldn't take Jesus. And little Annie's heart was broken because her father would not take Jesus. She commenced to pray that God would save her father. She went to one of the workers and said, "I cannot get my father to come here. Won't you come down to our house on the East Side Flats and hold a meeting, and I will get my father to stay in." So a night was set for the meeting.

After supper Joe got up from the table and went to the hook to get his ragged old overcoat to go out to the saloon. Little Annie walked up to him and said, "We are going to have a cottage meeting here to-night. Won't you stay in?" Her father replied, "I don't want any cottage meeting." Annie looked up and said, "Papa, won't you stay in for Annie's sake?" Joe loved his little girl, though he was a drunkard. Some people think that drunkards don't love their little children, but they do. He said, "Yes, Annie, I will stay in for your sake." He went and sat down on the corner of the rickety old three-legged lounge; they had brought in chairs from the neighbors. Pretty soon the people began to come in until they had filled the room. Then the man who led the meeting opened the meeting, and Joe sat there on the end of the sofa. Then they sang two or three hymns and the leader said, "Let us kneel in prayer." Everybody knelt but Joe. As one after another prayed, Joe began to get uneasy and said (to himself), "I wish I was out of this. What a fool I was to stay here. I wish I was up at the saloon." He looked around to see if he could get out, but he couldn't without stepping over people's heads and he didn't want to do that, so he just sat there grumbling, "If I ever get out of this place, you will never get me in a place like this again." Pretty soon there was a silence. Everybody had prayed who knew how to pray. Then there was a silence, then a little child's voice. This is about what she said: "Dear heavenly Father, won't you please save my papa, for Jesus' sake." And Joe burst into tears and dropped on his knees at the end of the sofa; and, when I left Minneapolis, he was a deacon in my church, Deacon Joseph B——. Now he is a missionary among the lumbermen up in the woods. Who was it God used to save Joe B——? And you boys and girls, and young men and young women, can take Jesus and go out to bring others to him.

IV. I want to tell you another thing a child can do. A child can witness for Jesus. Do you know what that means? It means simply this, that children can tell others what Jesus has done for them.

V. One more thing a child can do. A child can plead. That isn't a very big word, but maybe you don't understand it. It means a child can beg others to come to Jesus.

Mr. E. P. Hammond was holding a meeting once up in Lawrence, Kan. There was a little lame girl out there who had taken Jesus. She had to go on crutches, and she took Jesus and was very happy. Her heart was filled with love to Jesus and with joy. A reporter sat there at the desk one day taking notes of what Mr. Hammond was saying—Noble Prentice, a splendid newspaper man, but a wicked man. As this little lame girl sat there she said, "I wish that Mr. Prentice loved Jesus." Just as soon as Mr. Hammond had finished preaching, the reporter grabbed up his notes and started for the door. The little girl picked up her crutches and hurried to the door Mr. Prentice would have to go out, and she got right in front of him and stood across the aisle on her crutches. She looked up into his face and said, "Mr. Prentice, do you love Jesus?" He said, "Get away, little girl, I am in a hurry." He could not push her out of the way—she was lame. "Get out of the way, little girl, I am in a hurry." She said, "Mr. Prentice, I love Jesus; I wish you did." And Noble Prentice burst into tears and took Jesus, and Noble Prentice became one of the most active Christian workers in Kansas. After I had told this story in Fresno, Calif., a lady came up to me at the close of the meeting and said, "I was there that day, and I knew that little girl, and she lived a great many years, a beautiful Christian life." She said, "I knew Noble Prentice, too, and he was a noble Christian man.

So, children, these are the five things you can do: You can become true Christians, you can live a beautiful Christian life, you can pray, you can witness for Jesus, and you can plead for Jesus. But before you can do any of the others, you have got, first of all, to take Jesus yourself as your own precious Saviour. Will you do it to-day?

Women's Status in Holland

MRS. IDA HUSTED HARPER, the well-known writer, is authority for the following about Holland:

"A tax is levied on families for every servant they keep, but a widower is allowed one servant free of tax, on the principle that, while he is away attending to business, some one must be there to look after his home and children. A vast number of widows have to go out to work to support themselves and their families, but the government puts the full tax on the servant they are obliged to keep. Women in Holland have no suffrage, but any man may vote if he earns 11 florins (less than $5) a week. If his wife and children earn this amount, and he is a drunken loafer, he still does the voting for the family. Any man may vote who has 50 florins in a bank, or, if his wife has earned this amount and put it in the bank, he may not only vote on the strength of it, but he may order the bank not to let her draw the money. The husband has the sole control of his wife's property and earnings, and may dispose of the children as he pleases. It is small wonder that Dutch women are agitating for the ballot.

NOTED PERSONALITIES HERE AND ABROAD

The Late Dr. W. R. Huntington

M. Briand, Frances's New Premier

Baron Hollweg, Germany's New Chancellor

Hon. David Oorfalian, Adana's First Martyr

DR. THOMAS D. CHRISTIE, president of St. Paul's Institute, Tarsus, writes as follows: "Hon. David Oorfalian, a member of the Governor's Council in Adana, Turkey, was the first of thousands of Christian martyrs slain in that city. When the constitution was proclaimed, last year, he was decorated; hence the uniform and the sword that he wore. On the morning of that fatal Wednesday, April 14, he was walking through the market by the Governor's orders, trying to appease the fears of the Christian merchants. By his side was a Moslem colleague. They came to a soldier standing guard. The Moslem councillor suddenly separated from Mr. Oorfalian, and shouted to the soldier, "Shoot this Giaour!" The man obeyed orders, and our noble Christian friend fell mortally wounded. Before he died, he told the manner of his death. The man who had him thus treacherously slain still walks the streets of Adana."

GERMANY'S new Chancellor, Dr. Theobald von Bethmann-Hollweg, is showing a firm and skilful hand in dealing with the important measures now before the Parliament. He is by no means a novice in cabinet and parliamentary matters. Indeed, the greater part of his active career of over thirty years has been spent in administration work, and he has held the important posts of Secretary of the Interior and Vice-Chancellor. Dr. Von Bethmann-Hollweg was a fellow student of Emperor William in university days, and has always stood high in the imperial favor. He is fifty-four years of age, and of Jewish descent, this latter fact being significant as showing that Emperor William attaches little importance now to the anti-Semitic prejudices which not long ago were marked among the German aristocracy.

FRANCE, too, has just remodeled its Cabinet. After the fall of Clemenceau, the most spectacular political figure in recent French history. M. Aristide Briand, who held the portfolio of Justice and Worship in the Clemenceau Cabinet, was chosen as Premier. He selected for the new Cabinet six members of the old, four of them being known as inactive or moderate Socialists. The two important Bureaus of War and Marine have been given to General Brun and Admiral de la Payrere. M. Briand is not yet fifty, and is a pronounced Liberal in religion. His Cabinet will make a special effort for the peaceful adjustment of the labor disputes that may arise in the near future.

IN the death of William R. Huntington, for twenty-five years the rector of Grace Church, not only has New York lost a great preacher, but the country has lost one of the foremost of Americans. For Dr. Huntington was much more than a minister. He was a saintly lover of his kind. He began his busy life-work in Emmanuel Church, Boston, in 1861, as the assistant of his distinguished relative, who later became the Bishop of Central New York. A year later, he was appointed the rector of All Saints' Church at Worcester, Mass. In 1883 he came to New York City. He was a man of deeds as well as words. He did not believe in a church which was contented to pray and work for its own improvement. Institutions for the betterment of the poor, the infirm and the degenerate sprang up all around it. The great heart of the new rector yearned over the hungry millions of the teeming city to which he had come. He saw that a crying need existed in the squalid homes of the East Side for the services of good women. This he met, as far as he could, by establishing the order of deaconesses. He also established the large Italian Mission on Fourteenth Street, which has been of untold benefit among the hundreds of thousands of New York's Italian citizens. He was active in every movement for civic welfare and spoke frequently at mass-meetings. He had a special hatred of gambling and condemned it publicly at every opportunity. Last year Dr. Huntington, having attained to the age of threescore and ten, desired to resign, but his church rose up as one man to prevent him. In token of their deep sincerity, they proposed to raise for him a fund of $25,000. It grew without an effort to $40,000. Dr. Huntington has willed this fund back to the church, to help in carrying on the activities which were so dear to him.

CHILDREN OF THE JUNGLE

Bazar Children of India

IS IT not strange that the Anglo-Saxon schools, especially the schools of the United States, should be looked upon by the nations of the world as the most desirable feature of Western civilization? Yet, if we stop to think of it, this is not so strange after all, for all the greatness of Germany, of Great Britain and of the United States lies in the great care these nations devote to the education of the coming generation. It is not necessary that the children should be taught how to become rich; but it is necessary that they be taught good morals and gentle manners, and these they learn in their schools.

Is it to be wondered at that missionaries, while seeing daily the tremendous needs of children in heathen lands, should plan and pray for similar schools in their fields? The problem of giving the Gospel to all the nations of the world in our day would be solved, if we could and would gather all the children in all lands into Christian schools.

One reason, I suppose, why more is not done to get heathen children into school is the embarrassment this success causes the missionary. Not only the "old woman that lived in a shoe," but also the missionaries, have so many children that they don't know what to do with them. Love will always win the children, and we have no trouble in persuading them to come to the Saviour. Alas, that there should be any, otherwise good, people even in our day who "forbid" these little ones, by their neglect, to support the work for the children as it ought to be supported!

How often has my heart leaped with joy when I have been with the children and heard their comments! At first, heathen children give a peculiar interpretation to the words of the Bible. The 23d Psalm had been explained to a class of jungle children; when the teacher, in order to make the lesson real to the little ones, asked: "Which verse in the Psalm is the most beautiful one?" A little girl replied: "The second." "Why?" "Because, if I am at the still waters, I don't have to fetch heavy pots of water from the well!" Another little girl said: "No, that is not the best verse; the fifth verse is better than that one." "Why?" "If I have a table in the presence of my enemies and they see me eat, while they go hungry, will they not envy me?"

But soon the children learn that Jesus does not like that kind of a spirit, and when their little hearts have been opened to receive the Gospel message, they become enthusiastic followers of Jesus. I once gave a fruit to a little boy, while he sat on my knee. Some months afterward, the boy's grandfather, a high-caste Hindu, asked for baptism. When asked why he wanted to follow Jesus he replied: "Because the religion that teaches love for little children is the true religion! My grandchild taught me the way of life."

It is our duty to bring the children to Jesus. We need means with which to work. Here in Bapatla we need five thousand dollars to enlarge our CHRISTIAN HERALD Gospel Hall, and a thousand dollars a year to keep the work running. "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it."

HOLLAND SENDS US THE "HALF MOON"

By T. A. METS

Our Special Correspondent in Amsterdam

As soon as it became known in the Netherlands that America proposed to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Hudson River a committee was formed, under the patronage of H. R. H. Prince Henry of the Netherlands, consort of Queen Wilhelmina, with the purpose of making the people of the United States a present fitting to the occasion. This committee decided upon the building of a ship which should be an exact facsimile of the vessel in which, three centuries ago, Hudson made his famous voyage, and to present this to the New York Committee having charge of the Hudson-Fulton celebration in September of this year.

After having received the royal authorization to build the vessel at the navy yard at Amsterdam, the keel was laid there on October 29, 1908, and on April 15 last the twentieth century Half Moon was launched. The architect was Mr. C. Loder, chief naval constructor in the department of the navy, who, however, did not live to see the vessel finished. The actual builder is Mr. E. J. Benthem, assistant chief engineer in the navy, to whose kindness the writer is indebted for much of the matter herein given.

The plan of the vessel was obtained both from the archives in the department of the Dutch Navy and from other trustworthy archæological sources, so that there is not the slightest room for doubt as to the resemblance of the present Half Moon to Hudson's world-famous ship. Both in the fitting out of the vessel and in the making of the sailors' costumes various firms in different cities took part without compensation, either for labor or material. And as a proof of the fidelity observed in the reconstruction of the ship it may be noted that, when the principal flag was delivered to the committee in charge and was found to have been sewed by machine, it was instantly condemned and another ordered, to be made entirely by hand, because a flag sewed by machine would not have been a true reproduction of the flag flown by Hudson. In like manner none but hammered metals were permitted to be used, the only parts belonging to the ship that were cast being the cannon. All the flags are exact reproductions, having been made in faithful imitation of those used in Hudson's days, and were made of material woven for this special purpose.

After having been launched, the little ship lay for some time in front of the admiralty building at Amsterdam, where it was visited by thousands, and afterward was towed to Rotterdam, where it lay in the Veerhaven (ferry harbor). The passage of the little ship from city to city along the inner waterways was a continuous ovation. At Rotterdam it was dismantled and put aboard the Soestdyk, one of the steamers of the Holland-America line, to be conveyed to New York, there to form part of the great procession of vessels that will ascend the river during the great celebration in September.

Its crew consists of eighteen men, taken from the Dutch cruiser Utrecht, now in West Indian waters, with First Lieutenant Lam as skipper and Midshipman de Meester as mate. Insignificant though the little craft will appear, compared with the immense floating castles of our day, it is safe to say that not one of these will attract as much attention as this replica of the Half Moon.

Because of the fidelity with which the seventeenth century vessel has been reproduced, a description of the twentieth century Half Moon will give also a correct idea of the little ship which has made the name of its intrepid master so famous. The dimensions of the vessel are: length over all, nearly 71 feet; breadth of beam, 20.22 feet; depth, 8.42 feet. At the stern, however, the so-called "castle" rises nearly 22 feet above the water line. The ship carries three masts—a fore, main, and mizzen mast. Two peculiarities of the rigging soon attract the attention: the one, that the foremast leans forward, while the other two incline the other way; and the other, that the yard of the mainsail of the mizzen-mast—the only sail here found—hangs at an angle of several degrees, while all the others are horizontal. The first two masts carry each two square sails, while, as just said, the third carries but one. A still greater peculiarity than the others mentioned is the great square sail hung from the bowsprit, called "the blind sail," because this, when set, obstructs the view of the man at the helm. These six sails gave to a vessel of such small size a very considerable surface to catch the wind and must have made it, under favorable circumstances, cut the waves with no little rapidity. The large flags at the masttops and at the stern quite faithfully reproduce the custom of the day in this respect. The foremast carries the flag of Amsterdam, from the mainmast flies the state or national flag, with the coat-of-arms of Amsterdam in its field, while from the stern droops the company's flag—red, white and blue, with the initials "V. O. C." —Vereenigde Oost-Indische Compagnie (United East Indian Company)—and above these the initial "A.," indicating that it was the Chamber of Amsterdam, one of the controlling members of that company, which had commissioned Hudson to find a westerly passage to China. This last-named flag is the gift of the Society "Onze Vloot" (Our Fleet), whose president is Vice-Admiral Ellis, retired, and which seeks in every way to advance the interests and improve the efficiency of the Dutch Navy.

Sailors of the New "Half Moon" in 17th Century Costume

At the stern, above the main deck, have been built two small decks above the cabins of the captain and mate. A small roof projects from the lower of these decks, for the protection of the helmsman, who stands with his back against the cabin. Before him is the so-called "night-house," containing the compass and hour-glass, and the bell by which he indicated the time of day or night.

To enter the commander's cabin, one needs to stoop quite low; but, once inside, it does not seem such a very uncomfortable dwelling-place. That of the mate is much more inconvenient and oppressively close. The furnishings of the first consist of a bunk, closets, table, chests with books, medicine chest, a chart and globe, and the so-called "Jacob's staff," a very curious contrivance that served as a sextant. On the table lies, under glass, a map of the world of that day—the only copy said to be in existence and which was borrowed for its present purpose from the British Museum. Here also are a set of mathematical instruments in a case of shark's skin, a Nuremberg clock in the shape of a small cannon-ball, and a small duodecimo Bible, bound in vellum. The medicine chest bears the curious motto, "God bless the choice." In the chest of books is a folio, also like the Bible, bound in vellum and bearing the date of 1469. Whether this also formed a part of Hudson's small library may be questioned. On top of the medicine chest, in a shallow box, are two swords, one long and straight, such as was carried by Admiral Jakob van Heemskerk, who won a famous victory over the great Spanish fleet in the Bay of Gibraltar; the other, short and slightly curved, and which belonged to the bold freebooter, Lumey, one of the captors of the city of Brielle, the first fortified place taken by the followers of William the Silent from the Spaniards during Holland's eighty years' war for national independence. On the walls hang several firelocks of the period, and a number of bandoliers with several cartridge-boxes attached, each of which contained the exact charge for a gun.

Seated on the benches placed on the high "castle," one obtains a most interesting view of the entire upper part of the vessel, from which point also its insignificant dimensions are almost wholly lost sight of. Here one sees the pump, the capstan, the curious figure of the "groote knecht" (big lubber), a wooden bust of a sailor, through the under part of which run the pulleys used for hoisting the main sail. Near this projects the chimney of the caboose, while on each bulwark stands a small swivel-gun. Forward is the fo'castle, under which are the bunks of the sailors—most uncomfortable quarters. Under the bowsprit is the "galley," the place in which sailors were confined for serious misconduct. The dress of the sailors, it may be said in passing, is a medley of various color and form. No two are dressed alike. While one wears a red cap, a blue shirt and brown trousers, both the color and shape of these articles worn by his fellow are entirely different, a fact that lends no little interest, however, to the entire grouping.

In the "between decks" are found the two heavy guns. Here also are the cable-bits, the primitive caboose, lined with tiles, the huts of the gunner and steward, the storerooms of the boatswain and carpenter, and the provision closet, the latter lined with tin for protection against rats and mice. The hold serves for the stowing away of cargo, provisions and "drink water," as well as for the anchor cables. The ballast carried by the little ship consists of long blocks of metal, equal in length and thickness, which fit snugly between the timbers of the ship's frame. In the hold one gets a striking impression of her strong construction, her massive oaken timbers and sides being indicative of the substantial build of the Dutch ships of that day.

When viewing this twentieth century Half Moon one is filled with amazement at the daring of the sailors of that day, in braving the violence of sea and tempest during their protracted voyages, and still more that, with nutshells like this, only better armed, the sons of Holland met and defeated the great seacastles of Spain! Could the spirit of Hudson witness the sailing up the North River of this copy of the frail craft in which he made his name famous, he would no doubt feel more than repaid for all he had to endure and suffer, both in his voyage of discovery and in all the cruel hardships that led to his dark and bitter end.

[As was announced in last week's issue, the new Half Moon reached New York safely on July 23.]

Among the Workers

—Rev. Ross Frederick Wicks, A.M., of Norwalk, O., has accepted the call of the New York Avenue Dutch Reformed Church, Newark, N. J. He was for twelve years pastor in Dayton, O.

—Rev. Arthur C. Kimber, vicar of St. Augustine's Chapel (of Trinity Church), New York, died lately, aged sixty-six. He was a well-known worker among the dense population of the East Side of New York, and established day and night schools, classes in cooking, housekeeping, laundering and sewing. His Little Hymnal has been universally adopted by the Episcopal Church congregations.

—Mrs. Elizabeth T. Brewster, of Hinghua Orphanage, China, writes us: "I have just arrived in Delaware, O., from Hinghua. Our children have all been touched by the Holy Spirit and greatly blessed in the revival. I desire, about the middle of August, to start a Christmas box to the two hundred and thirty boys and girls in the Rebecca McCabe and The Christian Herald Orphanages. Some of your readers may wish to help me. Acceptable articles are: Cloth (gingham, calico or duck), for clothing; outing flannel; strong, heavy cotton socks or stockings; handkerchiefs (boys' and girls' size); towels, soap, pencils, tablets, and other fancy papers for kindergarten work; picture cards, Sunday School leaf clusters and text-cards; dolls and scrap-books. Address 67 North William Street, Delaware, O.

—An interesting mission has been founded in Fortsville, Liberia, West Africa, by Rev. Lewis P. Clinton, the son of a chieftain of the Bassa tribe, who came to this country under the direction of Bishop Penick, of the P. E. Mission of West Africa, received his education at Storer College, Harper's Ferry, W. Va., and at Bates College, Lewiston, Me., and then returned to carry the good news to his own people, the Bassas. In 1900 Mr. Clinton obtained from the Liberian government a grant of 200 acres. One substantial building and three smaller ones and several native huts have been erected. Forty-five or fifty children, mostly boys, are under instruction. Mr. Clinton is carpenter, farmer, teacher and pastor, all in one. He greatly needs more buildings. Any interested reader may address Prof. A. W. Anthony, D.D., of Bates College, Lewiston, Me., concerning this work and its needs.

The "New Religion"

AN inflated importance has been attached to a recent address by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, before the Summer School of Theology. While the speaker is recognized as a man of high educational achievement and great influence, he has never claimed to be an authority in the domain of theology. Hence, the serious criticism which his speech has aroused from both press and pulpit has little justification.

Only a few weeks ago, the worthy doctor undertook to select "five feet of books," the thorough reading of which would give one a liberal education. This provoked a quiet, good-natured smile among practical educators, who did not take him seriously. Now, he has again proved himself the possessor of a resourceful imagination in his prediction of a "New Religion," which was the theme of his late address. This religion, he assured his hearers, would be without creed or dogma; without authority, spiritual or temporal, prophetic or revealed; without sacraments, in the symbolic or ritualistic sense. It would be monotheistic, and would have "no deification of remarkable human beings," no intermediary, no promises of future reward or compensation for present evils. Its cardinal doctrine would be "love to God and our fellow-men."

In all of this Dr. Eliot strikes no new note. He simply echoes the old Unitarianism, the older rationalism and the oldest pantheism that are the logical result of the strange theological training in some of our divinity schools and colleges to-day. He holds that Christianity is dying out, and that the age of faith has gone; but the same assertions have been made in every century—ay, almost in every decade —since Jesus came to redeem the world. Like everything that is postulated or assumed without evidence, these hollow and meaningless predictions pass away and are soon forgotten.

It is hardly necessary to point out the radical inconsistencies in the doctor's "New Religion," which, in themselves, are enough to take it quite out of the sphere of serious consideration. He says it is to be a progressive religion, yet it will "be a purely human affair, without Biblical authority or church sanction." Man must frame his own substitute for a creed and be his own highest authority as to the nature of God, whom he must conjure out of the "multitude of infinities." This "New Religion," creedless, Christless, crossless, heavenless, with its hazy and impotent deity, is not a religion at all, either new or old, but a very weak sort of moral philosophy suited to an age and race that had not yet felt the awakening of spiritual life. It is not a religion to live by or to die for. Dr. Eliot's cold and repellent outline wholly lacks the vital touch which is needed to bring God and man together—the Divinely-human intermediary, Jesus Christ. He seems to have overlooked the fact that the cardinal doctrine of his new idea—love to God and fellow-man—is the central idea in Christ's teachings.

Now, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recognizes the right of every man in this land of religious liberty to think, to believe and to worship after his own fashion, or even to cut loose from all spiritual anchorage, although such an act could not be viewed without regret. Dr. Eliot has this right, and he has used it apparently to trek out into the old wilderness of doubt and darkness and disbelief, where there is neither signpost nor plain path. The great pity of it is that he is liable to draw out with him young and inexperienced students, who ought to be under sounder advisement. In rejecting the cumulative spiritual experience of twenty centuries, he is like a mariner at sea who throws charts and compass overboard and has no idea of his destination. With such a religion, life becomes a mystery and death a venture in the dark.

Some twenty years ago or more, a writer noted for his theological vagaries, said to his publisher: "I have just finished a book which, when it comes out, will absolutely dispose of all that is left of Christianity. Here is the manuscript. I don't want it issued just at present, for it would shock some of my orthodox friends. Hold it for ten years and then print it. If I should die meanwhile, give it to the world at once." He did not die. Ten years later, the book which was to utterly demolish Christianity was published, and—it scarcely raised a ripple! It is now an almost forgotten volume, a mere controversial curio, found on the shelves of the studious, and rarely mentioned. So it will be with all the latter-day agnostic lucubrations of Foster, Eliot, Schurman, and others of the same school. Having no real message for humanity, their product must soon pass into the limbo of things forgotten, while the Gospel will continue to go forward on its mission of world-wide enlightenment.

Holland's Beautiful Gift

SINCE the dainty replicas of the Niña, the Pinta and the Santa Maria reached our shores, in 1892, no vessel has attracted the delighted attention here that now centres around the Half Moon, the gift of Holland to our country as its share in our coming celebration of the discovery of the Hudson River.

The Half Moon bears a family resemblance to the pretty Columbian caravels, but, though differing from them in minor respects, is quite as graceful. The modern mind can with difficulty imagine the courage and expert seamanship which would permit a man, in a ship like this, to adventure upon new and unknown seas and even to brave the vague perils of Arctic waters; for, though the Discovery was the ship in which Hudson sailed through the straits and into the bay which bears his name, yet it was of the same general description as the Half Moon. The thanks of our republic are doubly due to the nation which has devised this beautiful gift for the fidelity with which the original Half Moon has been reproduced.

Our ancestors found upon the blood-stained shores of Holland a refuge from the yoke of the oppressor, for the spirit of Holland has ever been that of freedom and independence. More than any other continental country of Europe it resembles our own, both in language and in temper. Our common interest in the great navigator, in whose memory we are planning our brilliant September celebration, helps to bind us still more closely together, and the bonds are cemented anew by Holland's thoughtful and beautiful gift.

Humanity in Business

THE first decade of the twentieth century, whatever its faults may be, will go down in history as the period when giant strides were taken toward the stamping out of tuberculosis. This arch-enemy of mankind has grown to such proportions that, like a fiendish colossus, it overshadows almost every household in our land. Profound study into its nature and tendencies has revealed its highly preventable character. Fresh air, good food and scrupulous cleanliness are the main essentials to its conquest. If employed in time, these agents will cure ordinary cases of consumption, almost entirely without the aid of medicines.

One of our great metropolitan life insurance companies has figured the deaths from tuberculosis among its policyholders at one every thirty-two minutes. It seems strange that the company did not, years ago, think of protecting itself against the heavy financial drain resulting from such deaths by promoting the extinction of its cause.

The thought has now come to this great association, and in a startling, almost a revolutionary, form. It has applied to the State Insurance Department of New York for permission to buy a tract of three thousand acres, and to build thereon a sanitarium for its consumptive policyholders. The expense entailed is estimated at only about two cents on every $1,000 of insurance carried, and the effect is likely to be highly cumulative. The descendants of the patients treated are likely to benefit, as well as the patients themselves.

Congresses are being held, and experts are busy on every hand in determining means for prolonging life. The insurance companies are naturally among the foremost supporters of these important movements. Thus business reinforces a mighty humanitarian movement; and this novel plan for giving to hundreds of afflicted invalids a chance to get well, such as many of them could not otherwise afford, stands among the most marvelous monuments of modern sanitary progress.

Invisible Ministry

A MOTHER, before retiring for the night, goes her rounds through the bedrooms of her children, making them comfortable in their beds. One she tucks carefully in, another she lifts and makes more easy on his pillow, a third she cools by throwing off the heavy coverlet by which she is oppressed. And, coming down again to her own room, she says to her husband, "The dear unconscious ones! They never knew that I was near them." But her ministry was real and beneficial, notwithstanding their unconsciousness.

So of those angelic attendants whom God has commissioned to wait upon his people. They gird us when we know it not; they soothe us when we think not of it, and, as on the other side of the veil they give their report to the Master, they too may say, "Blessed souls, they did not know that we had been near them." How much God is always doing for us that we know nothing of at the moment!

GENERAL NOTES

—WE CONGRATULATE the new management of The Outing Magazine which is bringing that excellent publication to the front rank of metropolitan monthlies. In literary and artistic attractions it has few superiors, and the steadily growing popularity of outdoor life among all classes should secure for Outing a strong and numerous following. The August issue has many live features and the illustrations are excellent.

—ALTHOUGH BLERIOT has succeeded in crossing the English Channel in his monoplane, it is not to be overlooked that our own Orville and Wilbur Wright hold the world's record for the longest sustained flight. In a recent trial at Fort Meyer, Va., Orville Wright, carrying Lieutenant Lahm of the Signal Corps as a passenger, flew for seventy-three minutes in his aeroplane, covering a large part of the distance at the rate of some forty miles per hour.

—IN THESE days, when parliaments and various forms of constitutional government are taking the places of the old despotisms, we are apt to hail them as new developments. Parliaments really belong to antiquity. A historical writer has just pointed out that the Jews had a parliament in the days of the kings, and that it had its still older equivalent in the Edah of the Mosaic period, which was an assemblage of the leaders of the people.

—A SAGACIOUS OBSERVER has remarked that "the civilization of a people or a community does not reach higher than the standard of its newspapers." Very far from being conducive to public morals are the accounts of great criminal trials, that are printed almost daily, with a mass of nauseating details. This dish of carrion is eagerly read by the thoughtless multitude. If appetite grows with what it feeds on, need we wonder at the increase of crime? If we sow the seeds of sin, we must reap the devil's harvest.

—KING ALFONSO'S unpopular Moroccan campaign may cost him his throne. His subjects have no sympathy with the wild desire for "colonial expansion at any price," which has cost several of the European nations far more than its worth. Now, with the fierce Riffian warriors slaughtering his best troops abroad, and with the terrible distraction of civil war at home, the young Spanish monarch is to-day the uneasiest and unhappiest ruler in Europe. Many a government has gone to revolution and wreck through the gateway of colonization by conquest.

Flew Over the English Channel

THIS paper made a record of the failure of Latham, the aeronaut, in his attempt to fly across the English Channel, and stated that the feat would be performed by some one in the near future. In less than a week from then, M. Louis Blériot crossed the channel from Calais to Dover, a distance of twenty-one miles, in his monoplane, in a little less than half an hour. By his success he won the $5,000 prize offered by the London Daily Mail. The Escopette, the French destroyer, which was detailed by the government to accompany him, had three miles start of the airship, but was soon overtaken by the aeronaut, and he made three complete circuits over mid-channel to allow the destroyer to catch up with him. For ten minutes he was out of sight of land on both sides and, having no compass, was blown by the wind, he knew not whither. Catching sight of the English coast, he flew for Dover, and with much difficulty made a landing. He received the congratulations of his own country, and will ever be hailed as one of the great heroes of aerial navigation. M. Blériot said, in speaking of the trip: "It was magnificent at the beginning, but the landing was a very stiff job. All the way across the wind continued steady, but as I neared the English coast it increased in strength, carrying me at least seven kilometres out of my course. When I first passed from sea to land, I was considerably to the east of Dover. To find a landing place it was necessary to fly back toward Dover, overland. This was a most difficult task. From time to time I got into whirlwinds, which swung me round on myself. One of the worst occurred when I was a little to the right of Dover Castle. I was then over a deep hollow, so near to the coast that I was compelled to descend. Fearing I would be carried out to sea again, I cut off the ignition and glided down from a height of at least four hundred feet. The front of the aeroplane struck first, smashing the chassis and bending the motor. The rear was absolutely intact."

The mortification of Latham, in falling into the sea, was nothing to that which he felt at having slept the early hours of the morning—the only time that success could have attended his efforts—and then making futile attempts later in the day to fly across the channel. By an understanding he had with Blériot, the prize money of $5,000 was to be divided between them, in case they both flew across on the same day. It is reported that he wept like a child at the success of his rival and his own failure. M. Blériot is something more than a mere adventurer. He is an inventor of splendid rank in his native land and throughout the scientific world, and his success is a combination of brains, courage and unconquerable will. The world will gladly give credit to such a manly man and hero.

By investigation and experiment, man copies omniscience in his increased mastery over the elements of nature, over the dominion of earth and sea and air. Christ, the Perfect Man and Divine One, gave an illustration of his complete mastery over nature in the miracle of quieting the storm on the Sea of Galilee.

What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him? (Matt. 8:27.)

Fulfilment of Prophecy

William Dickson, a plumber of Trenton, N. J., was curious about the future, and went to a gipsy the other day to have his fortune told. She looked into the palm of his hand and, among various other things, made this prophecy: "You're going to lose money soon, but not much." He paid her the quarter, which was the fee, and she departed. It seems that while she was examining his hand she transferred a ten-dollar bill from his pocket to the palm of her hand, and thus fulfilled the prophecy. The police were notified, but the female who claimed the power of divination had made good her escape.

The desire to pry into the future, a puerile credulity, and the thieving spirit of the woman left Dickson a poorer and should have made him a wiser man. There are mysteries that are beyond man's solution, and there are others that are revealed in God's written Word and by the Spirit of his Son. It is a pity to lean upon unreliable and dangerous supports in the search for the mysteries of this earthly life, or of the great future. The Father sent his Son into the world to tell us all that is necessary about this life and that which is to come, and the revelation of his secrets is the blessing of the Lord, which maketh rich and addeth no sorrow.

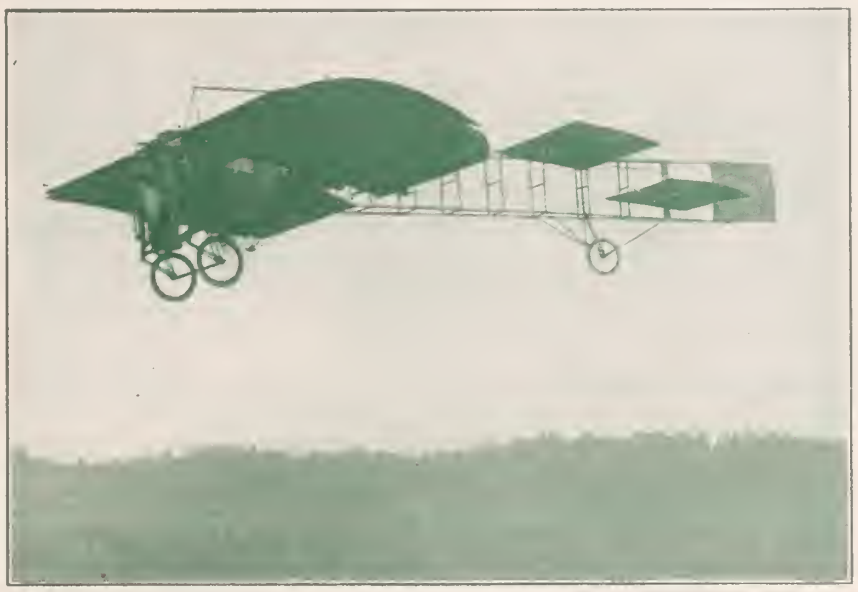
And hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. (II. Tim. 1:10.)

A Precious Life Lost

One of the most terrible tragedies of the summer season was the drowning of Mr. Bruno Hobbs, the Field Secretary of the International Young Men's

M. Bleriot, who Crossed the Channel in His Monoplane

Christian Association, in Silver Bay, Lake George. Mr. Hobbs, with his family, was camping at Silver Bay, and it was his habit to go out upon the water each day in his own rowboat. On the fatal day, he concluded he would take a ride in a canoe which belonged to a friend. There was a slight ruffle on the lake when he went out. He paddled the canoe out toward the middle of the bay, when the breeze became a brisk wind. He turned the canoe about and started back for shore, when a stiff gust of wind capsized it. As he plunged into the water he cried out, and a half dozen men went from the shore to his help. They caught him as he was going down the last time and pulled him into the boat, but every effort to resuscitate him was unavailing, and thus went out suddenly one of the most useful and beautiful lives in the country.



The Bleriot Monoplane in Full Flight

Canoes are treacherous things, and many of them could be wisely dispensed with. Mr. Hobbs was forty-five years of age, and had never learned to swim. Boys and girls ought to be taught to swim, under prudent supervision. There ought to be swimming pools or places, and a course of instruction in swimming should be a part of our public school system, and attendance upon those lessons should be made obligatory. The expert swimmer often takes added risks, but those who cannot swim run a risk infinitely greater. This summer's harvest of death from drowning is already fearful. The loss of this precious life to the world is to be deeply lamented. He was one of the sweetest spirited, industrious, benevolent and consecrated of workers, and was known throughout the world as one of the most devoted and successful toilers for the salvation of young men. It was a pity he had not learned to swim and that he trusted the frail canoe, but he took no risk with reference to the future life and was thoroughly prepared for the issues of eternity. The wonder is that people can live in the world, having ordinary prudence with reference to the things of time, and then run such fearful risks in navigating the sea of life and in providing against the tides and storms of the great future. The faith in Christ, which Secretary Hobbs had, is the sure protection against the dangers of the future life.

Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. (Acts 16:31.)

Blind Telephone Girl

Sightless from infancy, Miss Theresa Woods is operating a switchboard in the office of the New York Association for the Blind in New York City, where she is a pupil. Numerous calls are received at the board during the course of the day, but the blind operator, by means of the touch system, is able to answer them all without mistakes. Miss Woods was graduated at one of the high schools of New York and outstripped in her studies many of her companions who were possessed of good eyesight. Two of the switchboards of large hospitals in New York City are operated by blind girls.

What a blessed age this is in which we live, where science contributes so largely to repair the physical imperfections that used to render life well-nigh intolerable! It is the mind that sees, after all, and not the clay organ through which the vision is beheld. The healthy physical organ is the arrangement Providence has made for the normal person; but the experience of Miss Woods and others indicates that the mind can find some other way of seeing than through the optical organ. Rather than not have its vision, it will utilize the delicate touch at the end of the fingers as eyes. The mind sees the truths of nature, their relation to each other in the realm of philosophy, the beauty that lies behind them in the æsthetical world; and deeper, it recognizes obligation to fellow-men and to God. Whatever views men have in the scientific world, they are counted in the Scriptures as blind if they have not some vision of God.

Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. (Matt. 5:8.)

Light Weight and Short Measure

The wholesale frauds practised by certain concerns against the Federal government, by means of "doctored" scales, have their illustration in some degrees smaller or greater in the false weights and measures of almost all the cities and communities of the country. These frauds are emphasized by "Izzy of Indianapolis," a name given to Isidore Wulfson, chief inspector of weights and measures for the Hoosier city, who has become, by his detection of fraud in dishonest scales, one of the most interesting characters of the Middle West. He disguised himself, and detected well-nigh universal thievery in the scales that measured goods to the consumers. He has just made a visit to New York, and says he is convinced that that city is losing more than $10,000,000 a year through the failure on the part of the people to appreciate the necessity for the proper maintenance of a department of weights and measures that will cover the city. He insists that the force of public weighers is too small to do the work thoroughly. A butcher said the other day that, in every consignment of poultry to him, there was a shortage of never less than two pounds in the weight. He was an honest German, who gritted his teeth and struck one fist in the palm of his other hand with anger at the unblushing thievery, and yet he said: "What am I to do? If I make a fuss about this, they will shut off my supply at once." It is the duty of the pulpit, the press and the common people generally to cry out against this general robbery and institute such inspections as will bring about an immediate reform.

Thou shalt have a perfect and just weight; a perfect and just measure shalt thou have. (Deut. 25:15.)

How a Cebuan Robber Found Christ

THIS, I think, is the first time that a native Cebuan has written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As he tells me the story for you, I will tell it to you.

More than seven years ago, I found myself in the American prison of Manila. After my free, wild life as an insurgent leader in the mountains of Cebu, prison was almost intolerable to me. As I thought of my beautiful young wife, I felt my mind nearly go from me. The evil deeds I had committed under the name of patriotism came before me, and the bitter thought arose how the leaders in the city had shielded themselves behind me, making me the scapegoat for all their plots—men whose directions I had always carried out so faithfully.

At this time a package of books reached me from my young nephew, who had gone over to the Protestant missionaries. One of the books was a Spanish Bible. Well, I did not know where to begin reading it to find out if God loved me enough to keep the heart of my wife true to me, and to open the door of my prison. So I began at the first page, and from there read straight through. Before I had gone very far I began to pray to God. My mind became quieter, and at length, as I read on, I made the vow of my life to God. It seemed to me as if I stood in his very presence.

God set me free! The doors were opened. I had only spent a year and twelve days in prison. On my return to Cebu, my old friends, who were still secretly enemies against the government, when they found I was changed in thought and purpose told me I was of no further use to them and sent me to the Protestants. These people were few then compared with the many friends I used to have, and they suffered much contempt and even stonings in and around Cebu. But they had God with them. So I worked with those of my people who had given themselves to the Saviour.

After two years, when I saw that our pastor, Mr. Jansen, had broken down in health from his constant toil, seeking souls for God's kingdom, I went back again out into the mountains. I could not have done so then but for the fact that the teaching of the Gospel in those mountains had already cleared them of their robber bands, so that the constabulary who used to travel the hills continually in search of the vagabonds had been withdrawn, there being no more need of them. Where I used to live in hiding and wandering, and at times in evil doing, I now worked spreading the knowledge of the Saviour who had redeemed us. Those were happy days. I felt then indeed that I was keeping my vow of service to God.

After some months of evangelizing work, I reached the village of A——. To-day many of these people are Christians. It is now about four years since I went there and held that first prayer meeting in a little home. It was the first time these people had known real prayer. From this village I went on to Santander, where the persecution against us kept us fearful for our lives. There I preached more than once while the priest and his armed companions stood near by, jealously listening. But God withheld the fury of our enemies until after the people had built a chapel in which to worship. It was a time of joy when our friends from other places gathered for the dedication of the little church; but it was turned to one of unspeakable terror when an armed band of some five hundred men, with their priest, bore down upon us. We were in all some five hundred, but the women and children outnumbered the men. Of course we were unarmed. The terror came just when we were rejoicing in the hospitable homes of our friends after the happy dedication service. We rushed down the steep hillside, which led to the sea. Parents were dragging children along. Old and young were crying to God to save them from their enemies as, clinging to roots and shrubs, they sought to escape. One, who had been preparing food for us, was cut to pieces. He was my friend, whom I had taught to find God and to read his Word. He was killed cruelly, and the pigs ate of his blood as his body lay on the open ground uncared for. I would be the next to perish, I thought, and I determined henceforth to go armed, but my fellow-workers said God's servants did not fight; that his kingdom was not of this world. My faith wavered. I was not then ready in heart to be cut to pieces for the Gospel of my Saviour, and I returned in part to the service of my old friends.

Insurgent Moro Leaders and Their Bands

A few weeks went by and I was arrested on the false charge of a man who declared that I had attempted to set the parish church on fire and had used him as an accomplice. We were put in prison together. I prayed to God, who in his mercy heard me, and the poor fellow who had been used as a tool against me confessed how he had been bribed by the parish priest to spread the false charge. A lawyer took the man's confession, and it was legally witnessed. Soon afterward the man died in prison, but I suffered in that prison for more than a year longer. Bitterly did I repent that I had been untrue to my God!

Under Spanish rule, such an accusation would have brought me to a speedy death. During those dark days even the Bible failed to comfort me and the hope of liberty almost died within me. My Protestant friends thought it worse than foolish to appeal to the American judge, because they believed he was unfriendly to us. The lawyer who held the confession which should have freed me refused to give even a copy of it to my friends. My bail was put at six thousand pesos ($3,000). Of course I had no one who could bail me out at that time.

It was not long before I sought and found the pardon of God and realized that, though all others might forsake me and leave me to the fate I deserved because of my having broken my vow of service to God, yet God himself would not fail me. A year passed by. The longing for freedom ate the flesh off my bones and drank up the blood in my body! At last my bail was reduced, and my pastor was able to bail me out of prison. After imprisonment of a year and twelve days I was set free.

I am free! God keep me from again wandering from his service. Truly I can say that it must be preferable to be cut to pieces as a martyr for Him who bought me with his blood, rather than to suffer imprisonment for having wandered from his service. For the Gospel's sake I now gladly go for a long evangelistic trip, leaving my wife and child in safe care. I have had the joy of again seeing their faces, although only for a few days.

This fragmentary story, gathered from the lips of our Cebuan convert, has such a lesson in it, even for those who live where religious liberty is not only protected in name but in reality, that we send you the account.

Their New Range a Great Boon

SOME time ago, a brief article was printed in these pages telling of the needs of the Bethesda Leper Home at Surinam, Dutch Guiana, South America. One of the things most urgently needed was an American cook-stove to replace the primitive native affair then in use. A number of our readers kindly supplied the money for the stove, which was purchased through Mr. R. Dan Wolterbeek, of New York, and shipped to Surinam.

A letter from Rev. H. Bernhard, director of the Home, tells of its reception. He writes: "We are all immensely gratified with the great improvement in our kitchen, and we cannot be thankful enough for all the trouble taken in this matter by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its subscribers. Please, also, thank those good American people for their kind help given by sending bandages. If they knew how much they help to relieve the sufferings of our poor patients, every new package they send would add to the generous donor's joy."

Mr. Wolterbeek has sent us a photograph of the new range. He writes: "It was entirely built out of fireproof bricks, which had to be imported to Surinam and which has made the price of this range more expensive than first expected. This work took months before they could get a man out there to attend to it, as everything is slow in that tropical country. The range has a steel top cover, ten steel pot rings, six iron range pots, one copper water kettle, three steel doors and gates, one galvanized iron smoke conduct, one small steel plate, one iron brace for the smoke conduct, two iron roof plates. These, together with bricks, mortar, cartage and labor, cost in all 460 francs 80 centimes."

The New Range in Commission at Surinam

The entire equipment cost $57 more than the contributions, which balance still remains unpaid. Any further contributions received will be gladly welcomed. They may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Double Golden Wedding

An occasion of unusual interest, one almost unique in these days, was a double golden wedding celebrated on the 12th of January last in Fairview, Bradford County, Pa. Fifty years ago Mr. A. D. Spencer was on that day married to Miss Mary Whitehead, and the bride's brother, Mr. Samuel Whitehead, was married to Miss Lydia Spencer, cousin of the first groom. It is a far cry back to 1859, when these hale old people were young and strong. They still have young hearts and are in good health and have cheerful spirits, while children and grandchildren cluster about them. They came to Bradford County before the railroads did, and cleared their farms from the virgin forest. Both men being good carpenters, they were in a measure independent and able, when needful, to build houses and barns and fences as they chose. They have been members of the Methodist Church, and have borne their share in all that concerns the well-being of the community. Fifty guests sat down to a sumptuous feast at this double wedding, and many beautiful gifts were bestowed upon both couples. Long may they continue to live in honor and prosperity.

Protection for Girlhood

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE sounding of a note of alarm, and the formation of organized protection for young girls, both American and foreign, have attracted attention simultaneously of late. In a great country receiving immigrants by every incoming ship, there are peculiar perils for innocent girls. These perils are not agreeable topics for conversation, but they exist, and from time to time a community is startled by some terrible tragedy which darts a flashlight over the yawning gulf beneath our feet.

Young girls disappear from respectable homes, and sometimes are never found again. Sometimes families are awakened from a false security by the assassination or other mysterious death of a daughter, previously trusted and honored. Innocence should be a young girl's shield, no matter how wicked may be the men and women who surround her. That it does not always prove a safeguard has been abundantly shown by revelations dramatic indeed, but not sensational, as they come from officers high in the service of the republic. There are at present active organizations in every city, at every seaport, at each successive great exposition, that have for their object vigilant watchfulness over young women that their purity may be respected and that they may not be dragged into a slavery from which they cannot easily escape.

Another safeguard is imperatively needed. Wherever there are a father and mother they should look to the welfare of their daughters, and especially in rural neighborhoods should they be sure that agreeable strangers, tarrying for a while on one or another pretext, shall not too readily win the confidence of young girls.

A woman engaged as a deaconess in a New York church not long ago, on her way to prayer meeting observed two pretty girls under twenty standing at a street corner, as if uncertain where to go. She passed them, and then, turning, retraced her steps. After a little conversation, she discovered that they had come from a New England village, lured by a promise of work in the city. On arrival, no work of the kind they expected had been offered to them, and they had been puzzled and frightened by the situation they confronted. They had not sufficient money to go home, and they knew not where to turn to find a night's lodging. Their new friend took them beneath her wing, and saw them the next morning safely on their way back to their home.

Another woman, whose life is a consecration to benevolence, one morning came down to meet a young stranger in her drawing-room. The girl told her a pitiful story of distress and shame, a story in which she had been the reluctant victim, trapped against her will. Here, too, rescue was possible.

Mothers have a direct duty to girlhood, and this they do not always realize, because they are themselves trustful, scarcely dreaming of the evil that is abroad in the world. In this vast territory of ours, with its confluent streams from all the globe, perils menace girls, perils that were once undreamed of and unthought of. For the sake of the future and of the nation, we ought to protect our daughters.

Home Cooking

"My neighbors cook when they have time, but in this town few women know how to cook well, and most of the mothers buy their bread and depend on the delicatessen shop to furnish their tables." So writes a correspondent. Not a word is to be said against the delicacies furnished by caterers. We could not do without the excellent bread that we often buy at the baker's counter. Our correspondent, however, puts her finger on a weak point in much housekeeping. The good economist achieves more with simple materials when she understands how to manipulate them herself. The woman who can set before her good-man when he comes home at night an appetizing spread, whose bread and rolls are light, whose pies are flaky and whose cookies have a toothsome flavor, is doing an immense amount of good in the world. She is building up the health of her family. To set a good table is to start the children on a firm physical basis.

Home cooking is not a difficult art if a woman will give her attention to it, and think it worth while to take pains to make nice dishes and serve them daintily.

Concerning Disappointments

Some one has said that the way to look at disappointments is to think of them as God's appointments. Every one of us meets something now and then that interferes with our plans, or, having determined on a course of action, we find that we are obliged to turn in another direction. What we thought certain proves unstable. A friend on whom we confidently leaned is unable to render assistance to us.

We then make up our minds that we will cross the Atlantic and spend months in pleasant traveling, or we will go to the South or the West, and just before starting a member of the family is taken ill or an accident causes an entire change of programme. Let us look at our disappointments as the best things that could happen to us. Usually as time passes we are convinced that God's way is the wiser and better one for us, and looking backward we sometimes see the golden light falling on paths that once seemed too rough and steep for our feet to tread, though they are easy and inviting now.

Cleaning House for Mother

Bring me the dustpan and bring me the broom.
Surely was never so dusty a room!
Mother, may Jack hold the dustpan today?
Yes, little brother, she says that you may.
Now press the edge down quite close to the floor,
Mother says that is the way. Now, once more.
There! We have made it all perfectly clean.
Surely a neater room never was seen!

Education and the Last Decade

WE ought not to overlook the fact that the great prosperity of this country and the aggregation of vast fortunes by individuals tend, on the whole, to increase educational advantages. The great universities, and the numerous smaller colleges, have profited during the last decade by the liberality of men and women of fortune. Some of those who are distinguished by the generosity of their gifts started in childhood in homes of poverty. They appreciate the importance of the most thorough education that can be given to American youth, and out of their affluence they bestow libraries, gymnasiums and laboratories, or endow chairs in literature and economics.

It is to be regretted that so often, particularly in the case of the smaller colleges, the large gifts are conditional. The man of a hundred millions pledges a hundred thousand dollars to an institution of learning struggling for existence, on condition that it shall raise an equal amount. To do this it must go to friends, who already have denied themselves and strained every nerve in their efforts to support the cause of education in their midst. Undaunted, they begin again, and only on the book of the recording angel is inscribed the story of sacrifice and sometimes of suffering on the part of many, through which is secured the large gift of one.

To raise an endowment by nickels and dimes and other small amounts is no longer practicable, and the interests of the new generation stepping forward to take its place in the world's work demand that they must have abundant preparation. In the field of applied science, in that of civil engineering and in chemistry there are attractive openings for ambitious young men. Indeed, there are few avenues closed to-day to our boys and girls, if they are ready to avail themselves of invitations to honest work.

The reports issued at this time by various colleges indicate a splendid forward movement all along the line. There is no retrogression possible. Possibly there may be a too evident tendency to the multiplication of studies, and in the colleges for women at least it would be wise to lower the standard required in the entrance examinations. Yet when we consider the change of sentiment concerning a liberal education in the minds of the general public we are not sure that outside opinions can be accepted, when weighed against expert testimony. Those actually engaged in the education of young people are best qualified to speak on the subject with authority. The American girl and the American boy require a good equipment in intelligence and energy to enable them to meet the problems of the days that lie before us. Everything in the history of the last ten years makes for encouragement in relation to the higher education.

In the primary and grammar schools we note with apprehension a certain cowardice on the part of school boards. Why should dictation be permitted from our foreign-born citizens as to the influences brought to bear on their children in schools as free as the air of this country? Why should one set of people, for example, strenuously object to the reading of the Bible in a morning assembly and another set endeavor to eliminate Christmas observances at the high-tide of the year? We gain nothing and we lose much by truckling and evasion, and by making concessions for reasons political or other in cases like these.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXVII

A Wonderful Plan

THERE was great excitement in the world—the world of Mrs. Preston's musicale—and there was little talked of but Mrs. Preston's "find." The boy was undoubtedly wonderfully gifted—a genius, in fact; upon that all were agreed. The only question now remaining was, how should this great talent be best developed?

Suggestions were not wanting. The Prestons were besieged with them. Philanthropists offered uncounted money, and musical instructors placed at Preston's disposal unlimited service. Everywhere were to be found men of wealth and women of fashion who had some plan to propose. Even the duchess signified her gracious willingness to take the boy abroad and place him under the best masters. And at all of it Preston only smiled and bowed his thanks, with an apologetic, "It has not been decided yet just what he will do."

At last, however, there came a plan that made Preston pause and think. For some days he pondered it; then he summoned Marco to the studio.

"Well, my boy," he began cheerily, "I've some good news for you. Dr. Fernald sails next week for Europe. He will have with him his wife, and his son, about your age. They will travel for a few months, and they invite you to go with them; then in September they will place you where you can obtain the best possible instruction on the violin, and make an artist of yourself."

"Do ye mean I can git ter be a player like grandad, and earn money concertin' an' all that?"

"Yes, I'm sure you can. Will you go?"

"Go! I just reckon I—but there's dad!" The boy's face fell, and his eyes grew anxious.

"But your father is well off where he is, and you could do nothing for him if you stayed. Besides, I am here, and I'll look after him and be sure he is well taken care of. Now, will you go?"

"You jest bet I will!" breathed the boy.

"There's something else to it, too, Marco, that's particularly fine for you. In Dr. Fernald's party there will be a young college fellow who is going partly for his health. You will be his especial charge, and you are to study with him four hours every day. You know schools have been few and far between with you, and you want to know something besides music."

"Yes, of course," murmured Marco, abstractedly. (He was still in the promised land of September with his violin.) "An' will that fiddleman learn me pieces, real pieces printed on paper, same as the old man did?"

"Yes." And Preston launched into a glowing description of what the future surely held for him, if he would but do his best—a description so altogether delightful that Marco went home as in a dream. Yet only the next day Preston received a note, written in Marco's best hand:

"Deer Sir: I can't go. Good by.
"Your friend, Marco."

In less than an hour Preston had reached the old cellar-room and was confronting a wistful-faced boy, whose eyes were sad, but whose chin was determined.

"Why, Marco, what's up?" he demanded.

"I can't go."

"Why not?"

"The folks here say it'll cost an awful lot ter do all that, an' I hain't got the money ter pay."

"Of course you haven't; but I attend to that part."

"You mean you pay it?"

"Yes."

The boyish form drew itself suddenly erect.

"Thank ye, but I can't take it. I ain't charity folks."

"Of course not," retorted Preston, with a promptness that he hoped was prompt enough. "It's merely a loan, you know. You may pay me back when you like."

A dawning hope came into the sombre eyes.

"You mean"—began the boy, eagerly; then the hope fled and left a dull weariness. "I owe already eight dollars and forty cents ter Mis' Martin, where I come from. I reckon I better not git into debt no more till that is paid," he finished, disconsolately.

Preston coughed, and so managed not to smile.

"But you don't understand," he argued gravely. "All this is merely to put you in a position where you can pay the—the eight dollars and forty cents. When you learn to play well enough, you'll find people will pay you a great deal of money for your services. It's merely this: I believe in you; I'm willing to take the risk; I'll pay for your musical education, and when it's yours you may turn around and pay me back, if you like. See?—just a straight business proposition."

"Just a straight business proposition!" echoed the boy, hope growing larger and larger in his eyes. "Say, I reckon I will do it!" he finished with a whoop of joy. And Preston knew that the battle was won.

Six days later he stood on the pier and waved a long good-by to his "brother." The young man's eyes were moist. He wondered if, after all, he had ever come near the "core." Whether he had or not, he reflected, there could be no better hands in which to leave his uncompleted work than those of Dr. Fernald, the man at whose side the boy was standing.

On the deck of the great steamship, at that moment, Marco was watching with swimming eyes the white speck that stood for Preston's handkerchief, on the fast-receding shore.

"Jiminy!" he was muttering to himself. "The feller what wouldn't be red, white an' blue ter him—an' ter anybody else he wants him ter be—wouldn't be worth a—a tow-string for a fiddle!"

CHAPTER XXVIII

Eight Years Later

ON a beautiful day in February, a little less than eight years after Preston waved a good-by to Marco, the man stood once more on the pier, this time to welcome a very pretty girl with a fluff of yellow hair under her smart traveling hat.

"Florence!"

"Howard!" she greeted him joyfully. "I thought you'd be here. And mother?"

"She couldn't come; a sprained ankle—nothing serious, dear," he added quickly, at her look of alarm. "But you—how well you are looking! The trip has done you good!"

"Yes, I think it has," she smiled, coloring a little at the ardent admiration in the man's eyes. "But come, let us hurry through with the baggage, and the good-bys to the Eatons. I want to get home to—mother."

She hesitated a moment before the last word, and the man turned quickly. There was a question in his eyes, but he only said quietly:

"All right; and she'll want to see you, too."

In the motor-car, some time later, they picked their way through the heterogeneous mass of humanity and vehicles in the crowded streets and turned into the wider avenue that led toward home. The way was clearer now, but still all of Preston's attention was needed to guide the car, and the eager question that his eyes still held remained unspoken. It was not until after dinner, indeed, when he found himself for the first time really alone with the girl, that the question reached his lips.

"Florence, that hesitation just a moment before the 'mother'—did it mean—anything?" he asked in a voice that was not quite steady.

A quick shadow of distress crossed the girl's face.

"No, no, Howard, please don't," she begged. "I know I hesitated, and I could have shaken myself the next moment. I knew you'd see it, and—and think things. And you did."

"But, you see, it means so much—to me."

"But it mustn't! It wasn't anything. Don't you see?" urged the girl, feverishly. "It's only that now I—I'm conscious all the time of my position, and that—that she isn't my mother."

"But—I want her to be—your mother."

A swift red flew to the girl's face.

"I know; and she is—that is, she was; and I want her to be—as she was—only—Howard, you know what I mean!"

"I'm afraid I do," he returned sadly; "but I thought—I hoped—Florence, dear, haven't these three long months brought any—change?"

She shook her head; but as the quick pain leaped to the other's eyes, she said hurriedly:

"That is, I can't tell, sure, yet. You know three months is so short to—to decide—Howard," she broke off in sudden animation, "I found Madge Dana in Paris, and she's just lovely. I invited her to come to us in June. I'm just sure you'll like her!"

In spite of the pang that her words gave him, Preston laughed outright.

"Florence, do you know, dear, that's the most hopeless word you have given me? Girls who are in love, or almost in love, are not so anxious to introduce a possible rival."

"But I didn't—that is—Howard, I don't love you, that way," cried the girl, desperately. "Don't you see? It's all so different. You've been my brother—my adored brother, all these years; and I—I never thought of anything else until that night three months ago, just before I sailed, and you—told me. I've tried to think, to plan it out, to weigh it in my mind, ever since; but it isn't the kind of thing you can think out and plan and weigh. Seems to me, if it's love—that kind of love, it will just—just come, and I shall know it. And maybe it will come now. I have loved you dearly—ever since I was a little girl—as a brother; and it doesn't seem as if it would be too hard for the other to grow out of it. I hope it will grow—truly I do," she added earnestly; but at the eager movement of the man opposite she drew back. "Let us leave things just as they were, please," she implored; "and then see if it will—will grow. Don't ask me—don't talk of it, not for a while, please; and don't speak of it to—to mother. Surely you'll do that—for my sake?"

"I surely will—and more, if I can," promised the young man, holding out both his hands. "'Given under my hand—and seal,'" he finished softly, as he bent and kissed her fingers.

AMONG THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Triumphant Faith*

FEW people stop to think that if God should answer all our prayers in exactly the way we desire, it would amount to turning over the government of the world entirely into the hands of men. God sees the end from the beginning, as no mortal can see it. He knows that to give us the thing that we long for would often, in the end, cause us anguish. A witty writer has said that we spend much of our lives in crying for things which would make us cry far more if we had them. Fortunately, a wise Father is listening to us. He answers our prayers, though not always as he answered the woman of Canaan.

It is like the old, inexplicable paradox of foreordination and free will. We know that it is true, but no mind can fully grasp it. We are in the power of God. He moves us as he chooses. Yet to sit down and say that there is no use in personal effort, since he does as he pleases with us, would be blind and silly fatalism. We are to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling.

There is a period in the life of nearly every Christian when repeated failures to gain the exact gift which he prays for produces a decline of faith. Sometimes it comes to the very young, but the one whom such a doubt may shadow should fight it manfully. Pray on—keep your faith. You have not learned to pray aright, but God will help you. Keep close to him. It is the only way.

In a powerful sermon upon the text, "Wherefore criest thou unto me? Go forward," Dr. Louis Banks impresses the great lesson that God expects us to answer our own prayers. He has given us minds and hands, and he expects us to use them. The old motto, "Laborare est orare"—to labor is to pray—is as true to-day as when it was coined hundreds of years ago. This does not mean that labor will ever take the place of the quiet prayer in the closet upon the bended knee. It simply means just what God meant when he spoke to the frightened Israelites, as they paused in their terror on the brink of the great sea—"the duty now is not to call upon my name. You have done that—and the next duty is to go forward."

The motto of one of the great English families is in the old Saxon language, "Saie and doie." What is talk, be it never so fine, without the honest deed coming after it? It is worse than nothing.

Campbell Morgan tells a thrilling story of the effect of Moody's preaching upon the students of Oxford University. He was an unlearned man, and here he was at the very heart of English culture, but he did not flinch from his duty. He knew that these young men needed the saving power of Christ, and he placed all his faith in that power. For the first few days they heard him with derision and contempt. One night, just as the after-meeting was beginning, four students entered and began to make rude interruptions. Mr. Moody stepped down and buttonholed one of them, saying, "I want to speak with you." It happened that he had lighted upon the most prominent undergraduate in the university. Nobody knows what Mr. Moody said to him, but the next night the four young men occupied a front seat at the meeting. They listened intently to the great preacher's impassioned appeals, and when he turned to them and thanked them, at the end, for their presence and attention, the effect was almost startling. Hundreds were converted and all England was moved. A plain man had prayed, and then he had gone forward in faith, and through him a whole kingdom saw the power of God.

* Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, August 22. TEXT: Matt. 15: 21-28.

A Lesson in Prayer*

IT is somewhat significant that the lesson for the day in both of these great societies is upon prayer. A humorous writer in a great secular journal, after quoting the common saying that August is the most trying month in the year, once ventured the speculation that if each divorce and family quarrel could be traced to its source the discovery would surely be made that they all began in August.

However this may be, every one knows that in most portions of our land August is a hot and sticky month, and very dangerous alike to the physical and moral nature. We need to fortify ourselves against its influences by every means in our power, and especially by prayer.

One excellent suggestion is made among the long list of good ones in the Daily Companion. It is that we should keep a record of prayers which have been answered as we would have them. All Christians must believe that God answers our prayers, and our faith and gratitude should never abate; but the sweetness and joy of the prayer which has been fulfilled as we would have it, are beyond words to express. We know that we ask and receive not, because we ask amiss. When we receive, we may well feel that we have asked aright.

President King of Oberlin dwells much in his writings upon one side of prayer which is too little valued. There is something sordid and repulsive in thinking of prayer as merely a mode of enriching ourselves. It is true that we go to God as a child to his father, revealing to him our sorest needs; but the child is unworthy who regards his father as merely one to flee to for supplies.

It is the "staying persistently in the presence of the worthful"; the preservation of an "harmonious personal relation to God," which President King rightly considers to be the essential purpose of prayer—"the way into the great values." To contemplate the beauty of the Saviour, to dwell upon his perfection, to saturate ourselves with his divinity—this is the high and noble object of the purest prayer.

You say that you cannot realize the presence of Christ. You know not how to picture him. Sometimes there comes a moment of vision, but you soon drop back into the condition in which you feel that "a muddy vesture of decay doth close you in."

Remember that it is often some physical cause which weights your soul's wings. The physical, as we all know, often clogs the mental. Why should it not also affect the spiritual? It is said that Kant, the great philosopher, had a constant feeling of depression. He learned that this was due to the abnormal narrowness of his chest. Thenceforward he did not allow himself to worry over his habitual lack of cheer, as he had been wont to do, for he knew the cause.

If you find that your body is disordered, you can understand why you cannot rise to the heights of prayer. Be not discouraged. It is only the "too, too solid flesh" which holds you down. Pray on, and the spiritual uplift must come to you. As the best beloved of American poets beautifully translated the Spanish poem:

> Let nothing disturb thee,
> Nothing affright thee;
> All things are passing;
> God never changeth.
> Patient endurance
> Attaineth to all things.
> Who God possesseth
> In nothing is wanting.
> Alone God sufficeth.

And you can "possess God" only through constant, fervent prayer.

THE STORY OF MARCO

to dinner; but the doctor had strongly advised caution and little activity, and so she kept rather closely to her rooms. It was a tête-à-tête breakfast, therefore, for her son and Florence; and the girl, determined to strike at once the desired note of unembarrassed friendliness, began cheerily, after the coffee was poured:

"And now tell me about yourself, Howard. What have you been doing, and what are you doing now?"

"I'm afraid there's little to tell—of interest," he replied. "The most exciting thing—to me—that I know of just now is the expected arrival in New York of a young friend of mine—Marco Covino."

"The violinist—and the boy you helped years ago!"

"How did you know anything about that part, I should like to know?" retorted Preston.

"Not from you, certainly, Sir Modesty," laughed the girl, with a playful toss of her head. "But 'there are others,' you know! Besides, it was only eight years ago, and I remember something myself about a mysterious boy to whom you were being a 'Big Brother.' I think, perhaps, I should have been more curious, only I was a tiny bit jealous. I didn't relish your being 'Big Brother' to any one but me. But tell me about him," she hurried on, suddenly realizing that their own brotherly and sisterly relationship was not the subject she wished to discuss just then. "Tell me what you know of this man—every one knows the other part, of course, since he's become so famous."

"That's exactly it," retorted Preston, with mock dismay. "It's because he has become so famous that I'm so excited and so—er—uncertain. I'm like the proverbial hen with the duckling, and my duckling has set sail on such high seas of fame and prosperity that I can't do anything but run back and forth on the shore and wonder what it is all about, anyway."

"Oh, Howard, Howard!" laughed the girl. "You don't always use a brush when you paint a picture, do you?"

"But it's really so," declared Preston, earnestly. "Eight years ago, when he left me, he was a raw, slangy boy, with eyes that carried alternately the most adorable dreaminess and the most reprehensible—mischief, to put it mildly. And now——"

"And now," supplemented Florence, quickly, "he comes back a man—grown, polished, famous, and with a heart of pure gold."

A glad light sprang to Preston's eyes.

"How do you know—that last?" he demanded. "Who told you?"

"Mrs. Fernald. You know she is in Paris again this winter. I saw her. Oh, I know something about this protégé of yours, after all," she teased merrily. Then her eyes suddenly softened. "And I know, too, who is responsible for it all—yourself," she finished.

STICK TO IT
Until Coffee Hits You Hard.

It is about as well to advise people to stick to coffee until they get hit hard enough, so that they will never forget their experience, although it is rather unpleasant to have to look back to a half dozen years of invalidism, money and opportunity thrown away, which is really the terrible price paid for the weakest kind of a "mess of pottage."

A woman writes and her letter is condensed to give the facts in a short space:

"I was a coffee slave and stuck to it like a toper to his 'cups,' notwithstanding I had headaches every day, and frequently severe attacks of sick headaches, then I used more coffee to relieve the headaches, and this was well enough until the coffee effect wore off, then I would have sick spells.

"Finally my digestion was ruined, severe attacks of rheumatism began to appear, and ultimately the whole nervous system began to break down and I was fast becoming a wreck.

"After a time I was induced to quit coffee and take up Postum. This was half a year ago. The result has been most satisfactory.

"The rheumatism is gone entirely, blood is pure, nerves practically well and steady, digestion almost perfect, never have any more sick headaches and am gaining steadily in weight and strength."

"There's a Reason."

BUSINESS AND RELIGION*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THOSE who travel to different cities and lands generally try to obtain souvenirs. In a city like Washington there is a large number of stores containing nothing but souvenirs, which are such articles as miniature monuments and statues, and even portraits of the Presidents, made of macerated bank-bills; postcards in endless variety; china decorated with pictures of the Capitol, Library, White House and other public buildings, etc. Travelers to the city of Ephesus, in the year A.D. 57, or earlier, undoubtedly purchased "Dianians" as souvenirs. These were small models of the temple of Diana, containing an image of the goddess, and were to be obtained in terra-cotta or silver, according to the purse of the purchaser. Doubtless every one brought away a coin with him, which contained the image of Diana. Certainly in every home in Ephesus the Dianian was to be found, not as a souvenir, but as a shrine for the daily worship of the goddess. She was worshiped as mother of all, which relation is represented by the hearts which cluster about the chest. In burial, such images were placed beside the corpse as a sign that the dead had gone back to the mother who bore them. One sees in this claim for Diana a trace of Eve, the mother of us all. And in China to-day women pray for children to the "mother of ten thousand gods," and bring away from the temples little clay images to worship in their homes.

Statuette of Diana

But not alone in Ephesus were Dianians sold; there was a demand for them all over Asia Minor, so they formed a considerable article of commerce. On every ship that was connected with Ephesus there was a terra-cotta image of Diana as a safeguard against shipwreck. When all of these things are considered it must appear that there was a vast army of workmen in Ephesus engaged in making Dianas of one sort or another. Particularly did the trade of the silversmith flourish, because the silver Dianians were the most desired. It was certainly to the interest of the silversmiths to have the worship of Diana augmented, and, on the other hand, it was greatly to their disadvantage to have anything occur which would lessen the number of Diana's worshipers. And so, when the apostle Paul came to Ephesus and preached the true and living God, who was not to be worshiped with images, there was no small stir on the part of the silversmiths. Under the leadership of one Demetrius, they gathered together and were harangued by him. He declared that not only was their trade being ruined, but the temple of their great goddess was being defamed by Paul. The workmen were filled with wrath, and the whole city was thrown into confusion, and a mob gathered in the great theatre, which was capable of accommodating fifty thousand people. It was a modern labor riot in ancient times.

Terra-Cotta Image of Diana

There was a similar condition at Tsing Tau, China, when a company of missionaries were murdered, not by the dwellers in Tsing Tau so much as by an ungovernable mob, which had come in from the surrounding country. The discomfited silversmiths were joined by a lot of irresponsible people, who went rioting through the streets of Ephesus, going to the house of Aquila and Priscilla to seize Paul, and laying hold, by the way, of Gaius and Aristarchus, two men who had been seen traveling with Paul. They dragged them into the theatre. Paul was not found by the mob, and desired to go to the theatre that he might do something to quiet the disturbance, but his friends prevailed upon him to keep away. It was then that the town clerk appeared upon the scene, and by the weight of his authority succeeded in dispersing the mob. It is most interesting to read from the Bible how adroitly he did it (Acts 19:35-41).

Not a bad trade. Silversmithing is a trade both honorable and beautiful, but in Ephesus it had been debased. Compare with it the work done a thousand years before by those who worked in silver and gold in the building of Solomon's Temple, of which the doors were of gold, and the house itself overlaid with gold, and the walls decorated with graved cherubims, and the hundreds of pomegranates made of gold, and hung on chains between the pillars, and the ten great candlesticks of beaten gold, and the furniture overlaid with gold, and the snuffers, basins, spoons and censers of pure gold, and perhaps most marvelous of all the great laver of brass supported on the backs of twelve oxen—all a product of the gravers' tools (I. Kings, chapters 6 and 7). Five hundred years before Solomon's Temple was built silversmiths wrought upon the tabernacle when God filled Bezaleel with the spirit of God in wisdom, in understanding and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, in gold, silver and brass, and in the cutting of precious stones, such as rubies, emeralds, etc. (Ex. 36:30-35.)

Coin of Claudius (current in Paul's day)

The silversmiths of Ephesus failed in business because they were in an improper business. Paul did not preach against them; he only turned on the light of God's truth, and Dianians decreased in value. Undoubtedly those same silversmiths might have found some Christian channel in which to ply their trade. In every proper business a man can be a true Christian and succeed. Sin is not the winning horse in the long run, even in the livery business. Livery men are known who keep the Sabbath, and also keep their hearts from animalism, and yet prosper in money matters; as of old, they put "holiness on the bells of the horses."

It was proposed to the Duke of Wellington to purchase a farm in the neighborhood of his estate. He assented. When the transfer was completed, his steward, who had made the purchase, congratulated him upon having made a great bargain, as the seller was in difficulties and forced to part with his farm. "What do you mean by a 'bargain'?" asked the duke. The steward replied, "It was valued at £5,500 ($27,500), and we got it for £4,000 ($20,000)." In that case," replied the duke, "you will please carry the extra £1,500 to the late owner, and never talk to me of cheap land again." An unfair bargain and a Bible do not mate well as a span. You can't drive both along the same road. Men talk of being "average honest," which means dishonest. They speak of doing "about right." About right is all wrong.

Gains all gone. That is what troubled the silversmiths of Ephesus. They were so blinded by the love of money that they could not comprehend the truth as preached by the apostle Paul. So we may hold a single penny in front of each of our two eyes, and the whole beautiful world is shut out. This is an illustration of an undue regard for money. Young men especially are apt to think that the catalogue of happiness and success is all written on the back of bank-bills, and some are willing to coin their hearts to increase their wealth. And some are willing to throw their bodies into the balance.

Illustration Points. As the result of a conversation with a young man engaged in one of the largest silver manufactories in the United States, we have the following: Silver ore is mined, and then amalgamated with copper to make it more flexible. It is then delivered to the factory in bars, which measure two feet long by six inches square. These are melted by intense fires, and rolled into plates; from these are formed the objects to be made, which first appear in the rough, and then are fashioned into beauty by the silversmith's engravers and burnishers. Much of this is accomplished by heavy hammers, operated by mechanical power, and the results are far beyond that which engraving tools in the hands of artisans could obtain.

What a contrast all of this is to the small smelting pots and few tools which must have been used by the silversmiths of Ephesus! The young man described to us the great statues of Longfellow and Lincoln, which have been made in the same establishment, not of silver, but of bronze. So they make men in that factory. And God makes men, not images, because they have done something great in the world; but he creates men in his own image, to make this a better world here and now. When the Holy Spirit enters into our being we become flexible in the hands of our God; his will is not only our law, but it is our will. We are each and all a part of his great plan, and just what kinds of vessels he intends us to be is our bounden duty to discover, each one for himself or herself. And we must submit cheerfully to the hard strokes by which he fashions us, believing that no affliction for the moment seemeth joyous, but rather grievous, but afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness. It should help us to bear the "hard knocks" to know that he is forming us after his own image, that it is his desire that we shall be perfect even as he is perfect, which state we shall reach, or fall short of, according to the degree in which we work together with him for our upbuilding.

THE RIOT AT EPHESUS

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE triumph of the Gospel in Ephesus could not go on long. The work of every disciple must be tried. The enemy began to rage, and stirred up some exorcists "to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus." To the shame of the priesthood, seven sons of one of the priests were among the number, and they dared, in their blasphemous impiety, to say to the evil spirit: "We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth." To their dismay and consternation, the evil spirit answered: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are you?" And the man, energized by the spirit they had attempted to cast out, "leaped on them, overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded."

This thing became known; it was the talk of the city, and thus the name of Jesus was in every mouth; and the more honest among the believers were impelled to make a public testimony; they confessed and showed their deeds, and many which used curious arts—i. e., sorcery—brought their books together and burned them in sight of all men.

Meanwhile, Demetrius, a leading man in the manufacture of silver shrines for Diana, called the merchants and workmen and appealed to them, saying that "Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods which are made with hands; so that not only this our craft is in danger, but the temple of the great goddess Diana is despised, and her magnificence will be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshipeth."

The excited people rushed through the city, crying: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Paul would have met the angry mob in the theatre, but the disciples prevented him. It was decided that he should leave the city, so he "called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed into Macedonia." The Epistle to the Ephesians, written five years later, is evidence that the votaries of Diana made no headway against "the saints and the faithful in Christ Jesus."

Paul passed some time in Macedonia. A band of eager converts, gathered from different countries, accompanied him. Constant intercourse with Paul, and the near view of his life, must have been made a great blessing to these students.

Paul's little company next went on to Troas, while their leader went through Philippi, from whence, after the days of unleavened bread, he and Luke, who writes the account, sailed for Troas also. Some have suggested that Luke traveled with Paul as his private physician, but internal evidence from the Acts of the Apostles would go rather to prove that he was the transcribing witness of God's healings through Paul at Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Ephesus and Melita. Paul and his little band remained at Troas seven days; Sunday, the last day of his stay, "when the disciples came together to break bread," the dear old missionary's heart was full. Here were representatives of churches which God had used him to found in different cities of Asia and of Europe. Here abundant proofs of his ministry were to be found. He then went to Assos, and took ship to Mitylene.

Pure Milk for Baby

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early 50s. The best systems to-day are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

ON FOOD

The Right Foundation of Health

Proper food is the foundation of health. People can eat improper food for a time until there is a sudden collapse of the digestive organs, then all kinds of trouble follows.

The proper way out of the difficulty is to shift to the pure, scientific food, Grape-Nuts, for it rebuilds from the foundation up. A New Hampshire woman says:

"Last summer I was suddenly taken with indigestion and severe stomach trouble and could not eat food without great pain, my stomach was so sore I could hardly move about. This kept up until I was so miserable life was not worth living.

"Then a friend, finally, after much argument, induced me to quit my former diet and try Grape-Nuts.

"Although I had but little faith I commenced to use it and great was my surprise to find that I could eat it without the usual pain and distress in my stomach.

"So I kept on using Grape-Nuts and soon a marked improvement was shown, for my stomach was performing its regular work in a normal way without pain or distress.

"Very soon the yellow coating disappeared from my tongue, the dull, heavy feeling in my head disappeared and my mind felt light and clear; the languid, tired feeling left, and altogether I felt as if I had been rebuilt. Strength and weight came back rapidly and I went back to my work with renewed ambition.

"To-day I am a new woman in mind as well as body and I owe it all to this natural food, Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

Questions and Answers

N. W., Erie, Pa. Who was St. Swithin? What gave rise to the saying that, if St. Swithin's day be fine, we have no rain for forty days; and, if it rains, we have rain for forty days?

Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, was in high favor with Egbert, king of the West Saxons, whose son Ethelwulf made him bishop in 852. He became one of the latter's chief counselors, and was active as a builder of bridges and churches. His day is July 15. He requested to be buried in the open churchyard and not in the chancel with the other bishops, but after he was canonized it was proposed to remove his body into the choir on July 15. It rained, however, so violently on that day, and for forty days succeeding, that the removal was abandoned and a chapel was built over his grave in the open, which is the traditional story.

R. W. J., Henderson, Ia. What has become of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat which it sent to Rev. F. Jansen?

It is doing excellent missionary service at Cebu and among the numerous islands of the archipelago. There is still a debt of about $1,000 on the boat. Any one wishing to aid in the work can do so by sending contributions for "Mission Boat" to this journal.

Mrs. C. D. C., Salem, S. C. Shall we know each other in heaven?

In many Bible passages we find assurance of heavenly recognition and the preservation of individual identity. David said of his dead son: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (II. Sam. 12:23). See also the parable of Dives and Lazarus, which teaches recognition. See also I. Cor. 13:12; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 12:1; Matt. 17:3; Rev. 6:9, 10; Rom. 14:12.

B. D., Steubenville, O. Where is Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of "The Last Supper"?

It is in Milan, Italy. It has been fading rapidly in recent years.

H. McK., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. When was the old man-of-war Kearsarge built, the one that defeated the Alabama, and what became of her?

She was built at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard, and launched in September, 1861. She ran on Roncador Reef, in the Caribbean Sea, February 2, 1894, and was a total loss.

O. R. Morrison, Mass. What is the real name of Maarten Maartens, the famous Dutch author?

His real name is Joust Marius Willem van der Poorten-Schwartz.

J. B., Des Moines, Ia. What is the cause of the present trouble between Turkey and Crete?

From 1669 to 1898 Crete was governed as a Turkish vilayet, except from 1830 to 1840, when it was under the rule of the Viceroy of Egypt. In 1898, after years of insurrection in Crete, the Powers intervened and made the island an autonomous State, but subject to Turkey and paying tribute to that government. For the last fifteen years the Powers have granted to the King of Greece the right of appointing a high commissioner and also of appointing the Greek military officials there. In 1908, after Austria's annexation of Bosnia, Crete announced her intention of throwing over Turkish authority altogether. Turkey opposed this, and hence the present trouble.

Reader, Matteawan, N. Y. I have been much interested in the work accomplished by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in obtaining support for Christian native pastors, teachers and Bible women in heathen lands. What are the duties of these three respective callings?

Rev. W. E. Lampe, missionary of Sendai, Japan, gives this explanation: "In most mission lands the native pastor is the representative of the Church, doing almost the same work as the pastor here in America. The same is true of the native evangelist, who is the same as the pastor, except that he may be a native Christian worker who has not been ordained. Evangelist is a term used to designate all who are engaged in church work as distinct from educational or medical missionary work. The native pastor or evangelist is responsible for all of the activities of his own congregation, and, in a general way, is also often the overseer of the work of the Bible women and other Christian workers. The Bible woman gives herself almost entirely to work among women. She is often an assistant to, and under the oversight of, a missionary's wife, or a single lady missionary; or she may be employed by a Bible woman's school or committee, or by a congregation, to do work somewhat remotely similar to that of a deaconess in America. There are instances, too, where the Bible woman is the only active worker giving her entire time to Christian work in a given community. The work of the Bible woman is almost absolutely necessary in many heathen lands. She is an invaluable help to the pastor, and is often able to do much work that he cannot do."

H. T. P., Port Chester, N. Y. 1. Kindly explain Luke 16:9. 2. Also the parable in Luke 18:1-9.

1. Read: "Make unto yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness" (R. V.), meaning "turn those riches, which others so shamefully abuse, to nobler uses and to your own highest advantage." 2. The parable of the unjust judge and the importunate widow has its application in verses 6 and 7. It teaches Christians at all times to pray and not to lose courage, even though justice be long delayed. Jesus evidently meant to point out that if an unjust judge was at last won over to hear a repeated petition and grant a complaint, then God, who is just, would certainly do this and more.

Apropos of a recent paragraph which appeared in this journal, referring to a story in the daily newspapers about a Western pastor who was said to have had three hundred canary birds at a religious service, Rev. G. R. Robbins, of the Lincoln Park Institutional Baptist Church, Cincinnati, O., the pastor in question, writes us: "I note what you say in this week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about those three hundred canary birds at a service in Cincinnati. It is not necessary for me to resort to any worldly or sensational ways of getting a congregation, having the second largest congregation among the two hundred and fifty-two Protestant churches in that city. I have been pastor of that one church twenty years; started in an old building with a mere handful of poor people, and now have the largest edifice among Protestants in that city. We never resort to any worldly ways of securing money, but go to our knees in prayer, asking for specific amounts, and God has never once failed to give us the cash. I preached a few Sunday mornings ago on 'The Birds of the Bible,' and asked those in the congregation owning canaries to bring the same and let them sing in the sanctuary for the benefit of those who were shut up all the week in offices and stores, and hot, dreary, sunless places of work, that they might enjoy the music of those heavenly songsters. I wish you would urge every pastor of a mission or great church in all the cities of the land who is giving his life to help the poor with the Gospel to have a similar service, and souls would be saved. I see no good reason why we cannot bring flowers and birds, and have all sorts of nice and beautiful things in the house of God." Pastor Robbins' frank letter carries its own explanation. The birds' songs joining with the songs of the sanctuary was certainly a novel and beautiful idea.

B. R. K., Cincinnati, O. What is the meaning of "the sword of the Spirit"?

This is a beautiful figure of speech. Paul is speaking of the whole armor of righteousness which ought to constitute the panoply of the believer. The "sword of the Spirit" means, literally, the sword furnished by the Spirit who inspired the writers of the Word; the Gospel, which is the power of God to the believer (Rom. 1:16, I. Cor. 1:18); a two-edged sword cutting both ways (Psa. 45:3, 5), which Christ, in his temptation, used to defeat the adversary (Matt. 4:4-10).

Distress, Remington, Va. 1. Does God condemn us as guilty for sins committed when we were too ill to be fully responsible? 2. If the light of forgiveness does not shine in the soul, must it be inferred that God has hardened his heart against us? 3. Is there any passage in the Bible to indicate that God will not forgive one who sincerely repents?

1. No. God judges us by our motives; not by what we may do when not fully conscious. 2. No. God is love. He never hardens his heart against those who seek him in faith and sincerity. 3. The New Testament expressly and repeatedly tells us, in different words, that whosoever cometh to Christ, he will in no wise cast out. See I. John 1:9; Col. 1:14; James 5:15; Eph. 1:7; Acts 5:31, and many other passages.

J. D. C., Grass Creek, Ind. Please explain I. Tim. 2:14, 15. Has a Christian woman any favor over a non-Christian woman in motherhood?

Paul here simply emphasizes Gen. 3:16, in which woman's "subjection" is represented as the consequence of her "being deceived." See the Revised Version, which gives the preferable rendering: "The woman, being beguiled, hath fallen into transgression," and in the next verse the meaning is that, in spite of the ordeal she has to pass through (in maternity), she shall be saved by loving faith. The promise applies only to believers. In a larger sense, that ordeal brings a blessing to the entire race, since the Saviour was born of woman.

Nostalgia.

Mrs. F. M. G., Guy's Mills, Pa. Please print the poem commencing, "The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold."

This poem is one of the famous "Hebrew Melodies" of George Gordon (Lord Byron), and can be found in any edition of his works, as well as in many anthologies. Look in the nearest library.

Mrs. C. J. R., Vincent, O. Is the following in the Bible: "The things that I once loved I now hate, and the things that I once hated I now love"? If so, where?

The exact language is not in the Bible, but its parallel is given in Rom. 7:15-20.

K. S. D., Michigan City, Ind. Will you please explain Luke 21:19?

The words "in your patience possess ye your souls" are better rendered "in your patience ye shall win your souls." See the same prediction in Mark 13:12, 13, "He that endureth unto the end," etc. Jesus was telling them that all of these trials and troubles need not endanger their spiritual life, but that patience, fortitude and reliance upon divine help would enable them to pass through the ordeal unscathed and triumphant. (See Luke 17:33.)

M. A. Y., Grove, Okla., and other readers lately asked through THE MAIL-BAG for some directions for destroying red ants. Several letters have been received on the subject.

J. F. H., Denver, Colo., refers to Farmers' Bulletin, No. 3, published free by the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. A Reader, Fishkill Landing, N. Y., suggests kerosene oil. C. R. M., Pawnee City, Neb., says either kerosene or boiling water. A. W. W., Lowell, Mass.: Dig holes six inches deep in the ant hill, pour an ounce of carbon bisulphide into each and close them quickly with earth, and cover the hill with wet blanket to retain fumes. No fire (match or pipe) must be taken near, as the fumes are explosive. U. S. MacNider, Pasadena, Tex., suggests a solution of potassium cyanide (one ounce to a quart of water) poured into hole as an effective dose. G. R. M., Helena, Mo., suggests a gallon of coal-oil on the hill, topped by a bunch of straw, and lighted off with a match.

The Walls of New York's Great Railroad Station Completed

WHEN the granite eagles were carefully lowered into position over the entrance arch of the Pennsylvania Station in New York, the mason work on the great structure was completed, thirteen months after the first stone was put in place. There was no ceremony, but the contractors and engineers exchanged congratulations. The four massive walls of the building are about half a mile in length. Over 490,000 feet of pink granite was used, in addition to 60,000 feet in the ornamentation. The building is in the Doric style of architecture. The main front is 76 feet high, while the waiting-room is 150 feet high, and extends from Thirty-first to Thirty-third Street, a distance of 314 feet.

Tribesmen Who Are Fighting the Spaniards in North Africa

A Riff Tribesman

SPAIN'S WAR AND REVOLUTION

FOR centuries the Moors were thorns in the side of the Spaniards, and in the early Middle Ages it was long doubtful whether they would ot establish themselves permanently in Europe. Then they were beaten back into Africa. Spain lanted some colonies along the edge of the Moorish ountry, and these served as a bulwark against the nvasion of Spain by the bronze-hued warriors. Small wars were frequent. The present desperate truggle in Morocco between Spaniard and Moor, riefly referred to in last week's issue of THE CHRISIAN HERALD, led to an unexpected result—one which has startled all Europe by ts possibilities of international complications—the rise in bloody revolt of the various discontented elements n Spain. Though the bulk of the nation remained loyal, the anarchists and other malcontents who make a rendezvous of the city of Barcelona took advantage of the present opposition to Spanish policy in Morocco to draw large numbers into action against the government. At this writing, the active revolutionists are under control, and the movement has taken the form of a general strike in Barcelona, Madrid and a few other large centres; but the fires of insurrection still smoulder dangerously, threatening to burst into flame. The government is now sending large reinforcements to Melilla, which has been besieged by the Moors, and the centre of public interest will be probably again transferred to Africa.

The insurrection in Spain came with surprising suddenness. The Spanish general at Melilla found that the Moors were swarming against his defenses in a vast horde, which threatened to annihilate his little army, fight as bravely as it would. The Moors under arms numbered at least thirty thousand men, to whom war was both a pastime and a business, and who were delighted with the prospect of driving their ancient foes into the sea. The Spanish commander sent an urgent appeal to Spain for more troops, after he had lost three thousand men, and the government called out some of the reserves, as well as speedily embarking as many as it could spare from the regulars in active service in the various garrisons. At once trouble broke out in the province of Catalonia, whose turbulent inhabitants have in times past given more trouble to the Spanish government than all the rest of the country put together, and which is a hotbed of anarchistic discontent.

The reserves who lived in Barcelona, the capital of the province, refused to answer the call to the colors of their regiments, and in a day's time an insurrection had gained such headway that serious apprehensions were felt for the preservation of the public peace in other parts of the kingdom. By far the greater part of the Spanish people remained loyal, but at first the fury of the Catalonian mobs was so great and the depredations they committed were of such a startling nature that the sober part of the population felt distrustful. Even the loyalty of the army was doubted; but the majority of the troops stood unflinchingly by the government and gave their lives freely in the battles which crimsoned the barricades and streets of the Catalonian towns. A few of the regiments in Barcelona and Madrid, however, refused to fight, and a number of soldiers who mutinied were shot.

King Alfonso acted with great courage and resolution. He returned from the summer resort at San Sebastian, where he had been staying with the Queen. San Sebastian is only thirty miles from the frontier of France, so that, if the dark forebodings of some people had been realized, the Queen and the Dowager Queen could probably have made their way to a place of safety by a quick dash in an automobile.

The King and Queen of Spain

On July 28 the King and his Cabinet found the situation so grave that all constitutional guarantees were suspended and martial law was proclaimed in all provinces. In Barcelona matters went from bad to worse. The peaceable inhabitants locked themselves within doors and waited, terror-stricken, while the walls vibrated to the volleys of musketry in the streets and the screams and shouts that told of carnage and pillage at the warehouses, churches and convents. The revolutionists were especially bitter toward anything connected with religion. Church after church was plundered, works of art were stolen or defaced and the structures given to the flames. The great college of San Antonio was attacked with fury, and the professors and students were thankful to escape with their lives. The monastery of the Marists was sacked and many of the monks were killed in cold blood. The mobs, after some of the troops had declined to fire, felt they had a free hand, but received a discouraging surprise when strong columns of artillery and infantry swung into the side streets and opened fire on the rebels. The latter turned and fought desperately, and both sides suffered severe losses. The mob spirit spread to outlying towns, and neither men, women nor children were spared. Probably the details will never be known in full by the outside world, as a strict censorship of both the press and telegraph was established by the government, which was anxious that the reports of the

THE GLORY OF THE RANSOMED

TEXT—Rev. 22:3, 4

THE first part of this text seems to be a commonplace of the most obvious kind. "His servants shall serve Him!" Well, why not? What are servants for except to serve? And you expect His servants to serve Him. In this what is there wonderful, or new, or striking? There is here no vision splendid. And the reflection of a single minute suggests to us that we cannot have all the meaning of it before us. There must be something else. As the marvelous Apocalypse moves toward its climax—this book which has been crowded with martyrdoms and heroisms and world-shaking catastrophes and judgments, and the unspeakably precious promises of our God—is it likely that the swelling sentences which rise as billows of light out of emerald seas of splendor will sink down upon such a poor and nerveless phrase? "His servants shall serve Him!" Why, of course. But is that all?

What True Service Means

You might think from the use of the same word "serve" and "servant" that the same word is used in the original. That would be a very reasonable supposition. But it is by no means the case. And the entire meaning of the words is lost to us because it has not been found possible to make the distinction which the writer made. The English Revised Version has made the attempt, "His servants shall do Him service"; but there is little gain in the change. The word for "servant" expresses the lowest kind of servitude. The servants in question were slaves, and those of the lowest order. But the word for "serve" represents the very highest kind of service, and in the New Testament is exclusively applied to service rendered to God. It is frequently used of the ritual service of the temple. It describes the worship of God freely offered by loving and adoring hearts. And it is used for that true service of the Infinite and Holy One, which consists in the consecration of the whole life to deeds of love and mercy done for him—the service which Mazzini had in mind when he declared, "We worship God by serving man." And the idea of the text is that from the lowest service the believer is promoted to the highest; from humiliating and painful, and even degrading toil, he is elevated to a place among the great and greatly honored souls who greatly serve the world. The slave becomes a priest—a priest of the Most High!

In the caste systems of ancient India, society is seen as one enormous pyramid. Its base is formed by the unknown and unhonored millions who, in Shakespeare's phrase, "grunt and sweat beneath a weary life." These are the slaves, the despised toilers of the ancient world. Above them is the whole trading class, merchants and those who toil with their brains, those whom we denominate the professional classes. Up above them are the warriors, with, as their first and highest, their kings. But above all these, the highest caste of all, superior to all other, are the priests. In our text, the lowest has become the highest. The slave is priest.

Low Condition and High Service

What is the explanation? Seek the explanation of the caste system. Precedence is determined by the order of service and sacrifice. The priest is the highest type of man, because he represents supremely a sacrificial life. The warrior comes next, because it is his business to die for others when occasion demands. He, too, represents the sacrificial life, but he comes below the priest, for it is a nobler thing to live for others than to die for others, though dying may seem to boys' eyes the braver. Lower still are the merchant and professional classes, for it had not seemed to that ancient world that they had it in their power grandly to serve and sacrifice. These ideals are not ours—neither for warrior, king, nor priest. Christianity has revolutionized our thinking. I am telling you how it seemed to the world of a distant past. And lowest of all came the vast hordes of the enslaved laborers, and they could not sacrifice themselves, for they did not own themselves. They could claim no merit for service, for theirs was menial labor, and in any case they could not choose but serve. Service and sacrifice determined caste.

And in the glorified life of the blessed, which John sees in his vision, the lowest have become the highest and slaves become priests by virtue of service and of sacrifice. These, he says, are they that have come out of the great tribulation—not "out of great tribulation," as we often read it. You must not leave out the definite article. They have come out of the great tribulation—out of that agony of persecution which has made the name of Nero a synonym of horror for almost twice a thousand years. They, too, fought a good fight, kept the faith, finished their course. And having, in the days of supreme trial, supremely served, and that through supremest sacrifice, they now receive the crown of life, and it is—what? Larger opportunities and ampler powers for nobler and more enduring and richer service! His bond-slaves shall be His priests!

So, then, this is the first lesson of our text. The reward of good work is not freedom from work. It is more work, of a higher and better quality, with greater joy in the effort, and keener satisfaction in the accomplishment.

The Men Who Do the World's Work

In this regard we have only to think of the heavenly life as a continuation of the earthly. It is a continuance of it under perfectly natural and logical conditions. And we may well believe that laws we find operative in the universe will still have course though time shall cease to be. And we find it to be a law here that work well done does not bring surcease of work. It brings more. Every man who is really busy seems, to the first glance, too busy. The rule is that a man either has too much to do or too little. He goes under and joins the unemployed, or else activities, engagements, burdens crowd in upon him until you would think, and he thinks sometimes, that he must be crushed beneath them. If you want to impose obligations and duties upon a man, it is of no use going to one who is carefree at the present time. You must go to the one who is doing so much that he cannot do more. And he is the one who can do it! We are told that we ought not to whip the willing horse. We should apply the whip to one who is doing nothing. Possibly the whip, if applied with sufficient vigor, might be effective with the people who will not work, but nothing else would be. And you have only to name the men whose personalities are always in the public eye, the great leaders in the financial world, the captains of industry, the makers and teachers of men, with all the hosts of the statesmen, preachers, men of science—the minds that lead the mind of the nation—to see that those who have done the world's work have their reward in—more work yet to do!

Inspiration in Work

But the point is, of course, that such work is of a higher quality. There is work which brings—altogether aside from the rewards and emoluments which follow—immense joy and pride in the doing of it. And there is work which, aside again from its unremunerative nature, has in it only a minimum of joy and inspiration.

Such work may be as exhausting, as devitalizing, as the labor of him who wheels iron ore to a blast furnace eight hours a day, or feeds the voracious fires of an Atlantic liner, or drives a streetcar through crowded streets from morning till night, or holds a collier's helm on a lee shore in the teeth of a January gale. But what inspiration there is in the one—what lack of it in the other! There was wisdom as well as wit in the remark of the workingman to a bishop who was arguing against an eight hours' day, prescribed by law. The bishop said, "Why, I myself work fourteen hours a day," and I have no doubt he spoke truly. But quick as a flash came the retort, "But if I liked my work as well as you like yours, I should be glad to do forty." The whole story is there. I am not asserting that there is no joy, no inspiration to be found in the lower forms of work. I am asserting, what everybody knows, that there is more joy and inspiration in these we call higher. And we have agreed to call them higher just because they call for the grandest exercise of everything that is grandest in us, and they have the promise of deeper joys and high achievements yet.

It is good for us to take this view of the work we are called upon to do for God. Too often we are ready to complain, or, at the very least, to feel a little bit resentful of the tendency of church work to grow upon us. And I speak to some who, as we all hope will in the course of the coming days be charged with heavier responsibilities and find their labors taxed in the interests of the cause of Christ. Brethren, count it a reward offered to you by the Great Head of the Church. Esteem it his recognition of your faithful service, of your high integrity, of Christian character acclaimed by your fellows and attested by God. And you who have done good work, and begin to wonder when the demands of the Church upon your time will cease, take the heroic view of this and believe that it is God's way of acknowledging your service and of crowning you. He says, "Well done, good and faithful servant enter into the joy of your Lord"—and the joy is in yet larger work to do for him, which you shall do even better than you have done the last!

The Blessedness of Rest

And it is good for us to think these things of the blessed life. Did you suppose that it was rest? We have all heard of the tired person's hopes of heaven. How did they run?

> Don't weep for me now, don't weep for me never;
> I'm going to do nothing for ever and ever.

Very beautiful, is it not? But now tell me, doctor, lawyer, teacher, banker, merchant, man of affairs, and you, good women, filling your hands and your hearts with a hundred loving and gracious deeds to make this world of ours more beautiful, even supposing this were attainable: what sort of heaven would it be to you? Just think of yawning to all eternity! You would want to go—to another place—for change and cheerful company! Why does any person want rest at any time? I can only think of two reasons:

Rest may be longed for as the end of sickness, weakness and misery. If life has gone very hard with a person, and sorrows have multiplied, and misfortunes have followed one upon another, and if there seems no outlook and no hope, if body and mind are alike exhausted, then it may seem that there is nothing in the world so much to be desired as rest—the end of all things.

And the only other reason I can think of why rest should be desirable by any of us is as a period of recuperation after healthy fatigue, and as a means of storing up fresh energy for new tasks. Rest is delightful then. It is earned. And it is enjoyed. But it must not last too long, or it becomes a weariness to the flesh, and we demand some toil to rest us from its infliction. There comes renewed joy in renewed toil.

But now suppose this: Suppose that there is promised to you first the rest which you have deserved and which you need. With rest comes reinvigoration. Then great tasks await you, and as your spirit bends to them in glad obedience you find to your delight and surprise that you are possessed of faculties and powers adequate to your tasks. The work grows more and more important. It assumes ever larger proportions and takes on wider-reaching, eternal significance. And with the labor your powers increase, and you are always above your work, and never beneath it. There is no stress and strain. There is no sign of effort on your brow. Were there pain, the labor you delight in physics pain; and the joy of accomplishment you share with God. Would not that be heaven indeed? And such, I would have you think, is the glory of the redeemed.

"Friends of God"

Now, believe me, you cannot have a heaven in the next life if you have none in this. You must not hope to be enrolled with the heroic workers of the future, beyond the night which we call death, if you are not taking your place honorably among such toilers here, and working while it is called day. Churches are not clubs. The religious life is not self-indulgence. God does not grudge you your happiness, but you have no right to be happy, and God will not let you know what real happiness is, except as you are trying to help him to help his

THE WRIGHT AEROPLANE ACCEPTED

AFTER many weeks of preparation on the part of the Wright brothers, and eager expectation by the officials in Washington, the aeroplane constructed by the aviators has passed its stringent tests as to carrying capacity and speed and will be bought by the government for the United States Army. Ever since the triumph of the brothers in France few have had doubts as to their ultimate success in meeting all the exacting requirements of the United States War Department. Several minor accidents to their aeroplane and unfavorable winds delayed the official tests, which were watched with great interest by President Taft, the members of his Cabinet and most of the "official world" in Washington.

Now that all requirements have been fulfilled, the government will pay $25,000 for this latest wonder of the twentieth century, and also a bonus of $2,500 for each mile over forty miles an hour in the speed test. The machine made its trip to Shooter's Hill at the rate of forty-two miles an hour, so that the total amount paid to the aviators will be $30,000.

The first government test was passed on July 27, when Orville Wright piloted the aeroplane. He had as a passenger Lieutenant Frank P. Lahm, who is well known as a balloonist and interested in everything which will solve the great question of the practical navigation of the air. Orville Wright did far more than the government required. He sailed about over the grounds at Fort Myer, Va., for an hour, twelve minutes and forty seconds, thus breaking the already remarkable record made by his brother some time ago, and which it was thought would be hard to equal.

During the early part of the afternoon the wind blew at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour, and now and then came a dash of rain. The Wrights, the President and the waiting thousands were greatly disappointed. Then suddenly the wind died away in a long whisper through the trees, and at once the machine was placed on the monorail.

There was a moment of intense suspense for the thousands who were looking on with breathless interest. Then Orville Wright nodded, Wilbur let the car go, and it shot down the monorail and then forward into the air. The machine, contrary to expectations, did not act differently with the increased weight of an extra passenger. Gracefully as some great bird it skimmed along just above the surface of the ground and then mounted higher.

On went the aeroplane, as steadily now as an express train, absolutely under control, responding to the slightest touch of the guiding hand of the intrepid aviator. While in the air Mr. Wright explained each move in the management of the machine to the lieutenant, who sat as calmly and listened as attentively as he ever did in a classroom at West Point, where the floor was not so far away by two hundred feet as the earth was now.

The Wright Aeroplane Making its Record-Breaking Flight at Fort Myer

The night shadows lengthened out before them and the people became an indistinct mass below. When the time-watches indicated that the aeroplane had been up one hour a burst of cheering came from below, intermixed with the discordant honks of hundreds of automobile horns.

"We will go after the record," shouted Orville, and on they went. A few minutes more and a cheer from the officers told that the record had been broken. The machine came down gently through the dusk, bounded once or twice, skidded and then stood still.

The President sent for the aeronauts. He congratulated Mr. Wright heartily and asked, jokingly, how his passenger, Lieutenant Lahm, had behaved during the trip.

For two days following the weather man was unable to make any arrangement with nature whereby the unfavorable winds might be held in leash. Late on the afternoon of the 31st conditions were favorable and the race against time was made to Shooter's Hill, five miles south of the fort. A small balloon marked the turning point, and one about half way served as a guide to the aviator. This time also he was accompanied by an officer. He made a circuit of the field, and then headed south, at first flying a hundred feet in the air. The course lay over a rough country, offering no good landing place. The machine soon seemed but a speck and then was blotted out altogether.

A west wind forced the aeroplane a bit out of its course, but it regained its line of flight, circled above the hill, which was crowded with spectators, and came back at a tearing pace—over forty miles an hour. Soon a great shout burst from the crowd in Fort Myer. The machine could be seen skimming toward them, now in sight, then lost to view as it encountered some downward currents which sent it into the valleys. The craft rose higher and sailed in over the wildly cheering crowds. After a turn or two, it settled easily, and, as the officers stopped their watches, they knew that the Wright brothers had passed all tests and the aeroplane would become part of the Army's equipment.

THE GLORY OF THE RANSOMED

Sermon by Rev. C. F. Aked, D.D.

world. But if you will to do this— But listen to the next clause in the text:

"They shall see His face." I am quite sure that the two ideas are connected. Indeed, may we not say they are inseparable? "No longer do I call you servants," says our Lord, and the word is the same, "bondslaves." "No longer do I call you slaves; for the slave knoweth not what his Lord doeth." He cannot understand. He is not supposed to understand. He has only blindly to obey. And the scourge waits for disobedience. "But I have called you friends"—friends! And such are we, friends of God, entering by intelligent and reverent sympathy into the mind and purpose of God, understanding what our Lord doeth, reading his mind, co-operating with his eternal purposes, becoming fellow workers together with God in serving and saving his world. "O God, I am thinking thy thoughts after thee," said Kepler in his joy, when his telescope swept the heavens. "I can sympathize with God," said Tennyson; "I can sympathize with God in my poor little way."

Familiarity with God is promised us. It is not only contemplation: "They shall see His face." What is a face? Is it not a revelation? Is it not a revelation of the mind and soul? The face is the supreme product of evolution. What ages have gone to the making of man, and to the creation of that marvel of marvels—the human face! "All the greatest painting," says Ruskin, "is of the human face." And why? Because, as Plato so long ago declared, in the face is the consummation alike of the physical and the moral. We may not always be able to read it, yet the face is the face because the soul speaks in it. "And they shall see His face," and know his mind, and share the secret counsels of the Most High.

In this very Book from which we have taken our text, in an earlier chapter, when the seer looked upon the scroll of God's will—the scroll of revelation—behold, it was sealed with seven seals and no man was worthy to break the seals and open the book and read and make known the will of God. A seer who could not see; a prophet who could not prophesy; a preacher who knew not what to preach—no wonder he wept much in the presence of such futility. It is loss of power for us. If only we had insight and knew the hidden meanings of the forces which are shaping for weal or woe the life of the nations, and the thoughts which are leavening the masses of human kind, and the ideals recognized or unexpressed, which are now impelling and which will in the future dominate the destinies of the world! If only we could understand, that we might read the signs of the times, interpret wisely, lead with unerring wisdom and unfailing purpose! That we cannot is loss of peace as well as loss of power. We chafe against our ignorance. We beat our souls against the baffling limitations of our half-vision and large incompetence. And so the promise comes to us with comfort, strength, inspiration and irresistible hope. What we know not now we shall know some day. The bondslaves shall be priests, and for the reason that they shall see His face.

But our ambition grows by what it feeds on. Every promise fires our longing for another. And this does not content us. Here the blessing must begin. "His name shall be on their foreheads." The figure seems reminiscent of the ancient branding. As Cain was branded with the sign of the murderer's guilt, and the slave was sometimes branded with his owner's name, so is there upon God's children the character which bespeaks God's ownership.

There are few of us who cannot understand the pride of possession. He is poor indeed who cannot look on something, say it is his very own, and feel himself the richer for the ownership. The feeling varies in quality and in intensity. It varies in intensity, from quiet satisfaction to perfect rapture. It varies in quality, for it may be merely purse-proud and vulgar, or it may be devout, thankful, worshipful, filling the heart with a desire to pay back to the disinherited and the poor some part of the gladness which it brings. Such happiness is not conditioned by the extent of the wealth that is possessed. The man who loves books, for instance, and who cannot reach out to any corner of the book-lined walls in his little library without recognizing everywhere the face of a friend and the soul of a teacher, and without breathing, as he takes down the volume, a fervent "Thank God!" finds it difficult to believe that a huge fortune and a vast estate could bring him purer pleasure and deeper pride.

Dare we not think of a joy and pride and rapture in the heart of the Eternal to which these feelings afford a clue? If the adoring heart yields itself to God; if the will is surrendered to him; if we come to offer ourselves to him with no reserve and no delay, keeping back no uttermost recesses of the soul, but finding the largest service and the largest sacrifice all too small, who shall say that heaven's own gladness does not take on a richer hue, and the joy which is found among the angels of God over one sinner that repents prove to be but the faintest adumbration of the glory which is in the heart of God in the possession of the souls of men and women consecrated to his will? I dare not follow this flashing vision into the immensities and the eternities to which it invites me. My mind begins to reel and stagger before the contemplation of such august and awe-inspiring themes. I understand the mark which is to be on their foreheads. It is reverence that kindles in the soul and speaks from the face. It is adoration which transfigures the countenance. It is a God-like character which lights up the radiance in eyes that look with love upon the face of God. Oh, may I reach this purest heaven! Be to God himself a possession in which through all eternity Immortality and Infinity may delight! May we become his priests, and the humblest of us all, through the ages of the ages, sit with those that praise our God for that they served his world.

One of the Series of Great Revival Meetings at Winston-Salem, N. C., where Many Confessed Christ

MIDSUMMER REVIVAL IN THE SOUTH

By DR. R. A. TORREY

EARLY in March I received an urgent invitation from the Ministerial Union of Winston-Salem, N. C., to hold a meeting with them from June 20 to July 11. I shuddered at the thought of preaching in the South in mid-summer, but was told that this was the only time that they could get the big warehouse and that this was the only building in the city large enough for such a purpose. As they sent one of the leading ministers of Winston-Salem way to Montgomery, Ala., to urge upon me the need of the work, I decided to go, though wondering if my helpers or myself could stand the strain. They fitted up a warehouse 190 feet long and 89½ feet broad, reaching from one street to another. It was seated for 3,000 to 4,000 people, and located less than half a block from the City Hall and from the Court House. Though Winston-Salem has but 30,000 population in all, fully half of whom are blacks, the crowds were so large from the beginning that not only was the warehouse packed on Sundays, but it was often insufficient to accommodate the crowds that came on a week-day. Hundreds would be standing on the street in front of the building, and the building would be filled with people. It was also intended to accommodate a number of the colored people, but the crowds of white people were so large that the place reserved for colored people was of necessity very small. The leading ministers of the city, therefore, requested that I hold two meetings for the colored people alone, on Sunday mornings. Great numbers of white people wanted to come to these meetings, but it was felt to be only fair that, as the colored people were crowded out of the other meetings, the white people should be excluded from the colored meetings. The black friends filled the auditorium to the door.

The middle of the first week, the two moving picture theatres in town shut down, announcing that they would not open again until the meetings were over. The middle of the second week the retail houses of the city announced that they would close each day during morning meetings. In the middle of the third week, the banks announced that they would close during the morning meetings. As the warehouse was on a leading thoroughfare and the front of the building almost entirely open, the din from the traffic on the streets in the morning threatened to interfere seriously with the meetings. The city authorities, seeing this, closed the street during the entire time of the morning and evening meetings. At the morning meetings, as well as at the evening meetings, could be seen leading business men, warehouse men, manufacturers, bankers and leaders in the political life of the two cities. Ministers and laymen flocked to Winston-Salem from different parts of North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina and Tennessee. All classes of people were reached, but the work seemed to be more among the society people than any other one class. Four leading society women, living side by side, were among the earliest converts. It made a decided impression. There were many bonfires of playing cards; hundreds renounced dancing and the theatre and the card table.

The work extended into the factories and into the schools. In one factory there were thirty-one decisions for Christ in one day. I am told that there were really fifty, but the names and addresses of only thirty-one were secured at the time. The proprietors of this factory hold a meeting every day at 8:30 A.M., blowing a whistle and stopping the work.

The proprietor of a harness factory, just opposite the warehouse, came to me greatly burdened for his men and said that he could not get them out to meeting though he shut his shop every morning at the time of meeting, and asked me to send one of the workers. Mr. Butler went to the factory. Eight men were present; three were already Christians. The proprietor and Mr. Butler then went from man to man and spoke with them personally, and each one of the five accepted Christ. Then they shut down the works altogether, having a meeting of praise and prayer, every one of the new converts taking part. That night in the warehouse they made a public profession of their acceptance of Christ. The head of the commercial college told me that every man of real ability in the school had accepted Christ during the meeting. Last night three of the men who have been regarded as among the most notorious in the city came forward and accepted Christ. One was a constable, one an alderman who had been the leader in the liquor interests in the past, and another a man of whom many had said, "I cannot become a Christian while I work in the same place with that man." One of these, a magnificent looking man, weighing about 250 pounds, and who had the reputation of being "ready to fight at the drop of the hat," when he came forward was so bowed down with conviction that he did not hold up his head for a long time. When the way of life had been explained, he did not rise with the others to make a public confession of his acceptance of Christ. His wife had asked me to pray for him in the afternoon. I went to him, and, after explaining the Scriptures to him, the light broke into his heart. He rose to his feet, made a public profession of Christ, and then sobbed like a child.

We were unable to stay in the city more than three weeks, but there have been between 1,300 and 1,400 professed conversions. If we had stayed the usual four weeks, I cannot say what would have resulted, as in our fourth week we usually have more conversions than in any other two weeks preceding. The ministers will go on with the work in their own churches. Great pressure was brought to bear to get me to stay another week, but my engagements made it absolutely impossible. I was never in a city in which I would rather stay than here.

The music of the meeting was a great feature. We had a fine choir of several hundred voices. These were led by Dr. Palmer with great skill. Such music was heard in the warehouse as is seldom heard in the South. Mr. Butler and Mr. Young sang solos, not merely with great artistic ability, but with great spiritual power. Mr. and Mrs. Butler and Mr. Young sang trios.

Hundreds of people believe they have been baptized with the Holy Spirit during the past three weeks, and those who have never done any personal work before have given themselves to intelligent soul winning by personal work. The personal workers were trained every evening in the meeting held by Mr. Jacoby, from 7:15 to 7:45. They have gone back into their churches to hold up the hands of their pastors and to carry on their skilled work for Christ for years to come.

MISSION WORK IN VENEZUELA

THE Lord's work is making progress in Venezuela. It may interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to hear how the Word of God came into a Venezuelan city. About a year ago a medical doctor, who lives in a town that borders on Lake Maracaibo, visited that city. As he was sitting in a saloon, a copy of our paper, La Estrella de la Mañana (The Morning Star), was given to him. He took it home and read it, and a few days after we received a letter from him, in which he thanked us and asked for six copies every month. For a few months we didn't hear anything from him; but we prayed that the Lord would let the paper fall into good hands. Two months ago we made a trip with our mission boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, to the town where he lives. He was not at home, but the people there were ready to receive the Gospel. In a few hours twelve New Testaments and fourteen good books were sold, and many tracts were given away.

Three weeks ago he was in Maracaibo again, and came to our Gospel meeting in the evening. We praised the Lord when we heard about the good work which the paper had done. He had at first tried to give them away; but as our paper is prohibited by the priest, no one would receive it. But he cut off the heading of the paper and used it in his drug store as wrapping-paper. Soon the people began to ask him not to tear it, but to wrap up the things they bought in it because they liked it. Thus the Gospel was presented to them, and when they were offered the New Testament they were ready to buy it. When the doctor visited us he bought a Bible for himself.

We rejoice as we day by day see how the people are brought under the Word, which "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." And we have great reason to thank Him for the opportunity to place the Bible in the hands of the poorest among those who hunger and thirst for the truth.

A Group of American and European Delegates to the International Alcoholic Congress, London

WORLD'S CONGRESS ON ALCOHOLISM

THE International Congress on Alcoholism, called by Great Britain, lately closed its sessions in London. It was ushered in by sermons in many churches on July 18, and terminated with a farewell luncheon to the delegates at the Grosvenor Club July 24. The first business meeting of the Congress was held in Kensington Town Hall July 19, Lord Weardale presiding and delivering the address of welcome.

Delegates were present from nearly every civilized nation. Representatives of the various countries spoke, outlining in brief the status of the work in their respective lands. The man who set the great audience wild with enthusiasm was an American delegate, Hon. G. Cotterill, Senator from the State of Washington. They cheered him again and again as he made telling points in his address.

Speaking of the economic aspect of the liquor traffic, he said: "We recognize no vested interests in the liquor traffic. It exists by the tolerance of the citizens, and whenever they wish they can, by vote of the people, close every liquor shop in the State or community, and no compensation will be paid to the liquor men." This swept the audience off its feet. In Great Britain, the publican demands compensation and the government, by act of Parliament, allows it. This speech indicated the way the wind was blowing.

Dr. T. D. Crothers, of Hartford, Conn.; Professor Charles Scanlon, of Pittsburg, Pa.; Judge Pollard, of St. Louis, Mo.; Miss Cora Stoddard, of Boston, Mass.; Miss Brehm, of Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. M. Allen, of Syracuse, N. Y.; Mrs. Davis, of Milwaukee, Wis., and Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, of Washington, D. C., were the other American speakers.

Many very brilliant things were said at the Congress. Lord Alverston, Chief Justice of England, who presided on Wednesday evening in Queen's Hall, made an address which was simply superb. Some passages from that speech ought to be written in letters of fire across the heavens that all the nations of the earth might read them.

The public reception tendered to the delegates by the British Cabinet was held in the Imperial Institute, where the Hon. Mr. Harcourt, a member of the Cabinet, received, in the name and on behalf of the government. The Crown Prince of Sweden was there, and lords and ladies, counts and baronets, etc., were present in numbers. From beginning to end the utmost good feeling prevailed in the Congress. Men's and women's hands have been greatly strengthened to prosecute the temperance work. Offers were received for holding the next Congress two years hence. The United States sent one; but the Queen of Holland's kind invitation to meet at the Hague, July, 1911, was finally accepted.

THE NEW YORK-NEWFOUNDLAND CABLE LAID

VISITORS to Manhattan Beach were recently startled by the sight of a line of men apparently dragging from the depths the long, black body of the sea serpent which for years has been said to wander up and down the coast, frightening fishermen and bathers at the shore resorts. The long, black, lanky body kept coming out of the sea, and the bystanders found it was nothing more nor less than the New York end of the new Atlantic cable from the British provinces, its other end being even at that moment securely fastened at St. John's.

The cable was laid down the Atlantic Coast by the crew of the large cable-laying steamer Colonia, belonging to the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, of London, England. The cable is 1,307 miles in length. It was laid in a wide outward sweep in order to avoid a large number of dangerous shoals. For the distance of one hundred and fifty miles it lies at a depth of 3,000 fathoms, or in 18,000 feet of water. It is six inches in diameter at the shore ends, and is covered with gutta-percha. The shore end of the cable weighs over sixteen tons to the mile. Farther out at sea it is only about an inch in diameter.

The Captain and Crew of the Cable Ship

After the cable was brought ashore at Manhattan Beach the steamer sailed to a point 120 miles distant from Sandy Hook, and picked up the buoy marking the end of the deep-sea cable from St. John's. It only took two hours to splice the two cables.

It quite frequently happens in laying a cable that it is necessary to cut and buoy the end until the work may be taken up again. Great care has to be taken to obtain an accurate record of the location of these marking buoys, as it would be almost impossible to find them again except mathematically. These marking buoys are of steel and five feet in diameter. The cable is paid out over a six-foot drum at the stern of the vessel.

Laying the Newfoundland End of the Cable

After making the last splice the steamer came back to New York, but before she arrived messages were being sent over the steel wires from New York to St. John's, at the rate of fifty words per minute. It worked well, and the officials were satisfied that it will prove a most important and serviceable link in the world's cable systems. Later the cable steamer will go to a point 270 miles east of Newfoundland, where the transatlantic cable was topped, and begin to take in 900 miles of cable to Canso, Nova Scotia, which is no longer required, as Canso will not be used as a landing point for the cable company's lines.

The Tariff Bill a Law

AFTER a ten-million-word debate, which the country bore with great patience during five months, Congress has at last reached the end of the long tariff discussion. On July 31 the Conference Committee's report on the Payne tariff bill was adopted by the House of Representatives, and the bill was then passed. On August 5 the Senate adopted the report and, by a vote of 47 to 31, passed the bill. On the same day it was signed by President Taft, and on August 6 it became effective, with the exception of a few specific provisions.

On attaching his signature, the President made the statement that he did so because he believed the bill to be the result of a sincere effort "to make a downward revision" and to comply with the promise made to the country.

From a review of the new tariff bill enough can be shown from several of the schedules to illustrate the spirit and trend of the tariff revisionists in pursuing and completing their arduous task.

Naturally, there is more general interest felt in matters pertaining to necessary foods, solid and liquid, than could possibly be centred in technical and purely analytical details. Household necessities, as well as luxuries, are always matters of vital concern to the American people as a whole.

The details given below show some of the more important data connected with the general interests of our readers. As being the most necessary for present knowledge of the outcome, some examples of "non-interference," partial but illustrative, are placed first. The rates on articles mentioned have not been interfered with by the revisionists. Perusal of the items "let alone" will show, on their part, a keen realization of popular needs.

For convenience of reference, an alphabetical form of statement has been adopted. The rates for entry of these given products of other countries than our own have not been changed by the adoption of a new tariff:

Albumen, apples, almonds; Butter, beans, berries, all biscuits; Cheese, cider, citron, comfits (sweetmeats and preserved fruits), cocoanut meat, cocoa (prepared and manufactured), all other chocolates and cocoa butter, capsicum or red and Cayenne peppers, cereals, all cattle, cherries and currants; Dandelion root (and acorns), prepared, and articles used as coffee or as a substitute for coffee; Eggs, extracts of meat, earthenware (kitchen).

Fish paste or sauce, packed fish (except shell fish), fresh water fish, fruits (preserved), filberts: Ginger ale, grape fruit, goggles; Honey, horses, hay, herring, halibut (fresh).

Lemonade, limes, lenses for glasses; Macaroni (fresh and preserved, sterilized and sugared), mushrooms, mules, mackerel, (fresh), Needles for knitting (embroidery) or sewing machines, Oatmeal, olives, onions, oranges and lemons, all kinds of orchids, Pickles and sauces, peas, green peas for seed, pineapples (preserved in tins or jars), poultry, (live and dressed), potatoes, palms and other decorations or greenhouse plants, pears, plums, pomelos, peanuts and all other nuts, pins (solid headed), Quinces.

The second list, also alphabetical, is partial but representative. It shows some of the variations, upward and downward, in the new tariff, giving first the Dingley rate for comparison, and second the rate as set by the recent tariff enactment.

Alcohol (proof), Dingley tariff $2.25 gal., new tariff $2.60; buckwheat flour, 20 p. c. to 25 p. c.; bacon and hams, 5 c. to 4 c.; beef (pound), 2 c., 1½ c., cornmeal, 20 c. bush., 48 lbs., 40 c. 100 lbs.; cabbages, 3 c., 2c.; caviar ¾ c. per pound, 30 p. c.; dates, lb., ½ c., 1 c.; figs, lb., 2 c., 2½ c.; grapes (baskets), 20 c., 25 c.; hops, lb., 12c., 16c.; iron, ore, tons 40c., 15c.; iron, pig, tons, $4, $2.50; iron, bar, lbs., 6-10c.; 3-10c.; iron and steel bars and rails for railroads, $7.84, $3.92; lard, lb 2c., 1½c.; mutton and lamb, lb., 2c., 1½c.; peas (dried), bushel, 30c., 25c.; peas (green), bushel, 40 c., 25 c.; peas (split), 40 c., 45 c.; pineapples, bushel, 7 c., 8 c.; pork, lb., 2 c., 1½ c.; salt (bags, 100 lbs.), 12c., 11c.; starch, potato, and all other materials used as starch, lb., 1½ c., 1 c.; tin plates, lb., 1½c., 1 2-10 c.; tallow, lb., ¾ c., ½ c.; veal, lb., 2 c., 1½ c.; venison, lb., 2 c. 1½ c.; zinc, in pigs, and zinc dust, lb., 1½ c., 1¾ c.

As far as the sections relating to the necessaries of life and certain of the luxuries are concerned, close examination of the schedules shows that the revisionists have taken infinite pains to arrive at a rating which would be at once just and equitable to all concerned.

During the whole work of revision, the trusts influenced to some extent the schedules affecting those great industries and manufactures in the protection of which they were specially interested; but beyond a certain fixed point their influence did not go. Neither the trusts nor the friends of protection controlled or directed the revision as a whole, although their influence operated to modify it throughout.

Suffragists at Seattle

THE wonderful gardens of the Northwest seemed to be the feature which most impressed our Eastern suffragists during their triumphal journey to the July convention at Seattle. Receptions and banquets awaited the delegates at many points along the road. At Tacoma especially they received a warm welcome. The Chamber of Commerce there gave them a trolley ride to a pleasure park on the Sound, treated them to a luxurious supper and then tendered them a public reception in their hall, with speeches on both sides.

As the national officers took their seats upon the stage at Seattle, the band played "The Sweet By and By." One of the officers later thanked them for the beautiful music and said, "It may be the 'sweet by and by' for us in the East, but not for Washington." Strong hopes have been felt that this splendid State would soon stand in the suffrage column, but a hard fight is needed to secure it.

The brilliant nature of the Seattle meeting is indicated by the list of speakers, which included the names of Anna H. Shaw, Fannie Garrison Villard, Caroline Lexow, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Florence Kelley, Alice Stone Blackwell, Janet Richards, Kate M. Gordon and Ella S. Stewart. These are all well known as among the suffrage standbys. New and able recruits, who also spoke there, are Frances Squire Potter and Mary Grey Peck, professor and assistant professor of literature in the University of Minnesota, who have just resigned their positions in order to devote their lives to the cause of equal suffrage. Mrs. Potter is the author of The Ballingtons, and is one of the most popular and accomplished women in public life in America today, while Miss Peck is equally loved and admired. All who have at heart this great and noble reform, so important to the progress of morality and religion, must rejoice at the impetus given it by the accession of such helpers as these.

Views on the "New Religion"

WHILE many preachers and editors have taken an active part in the discussion of Dr. Eliot's "New Religion," we have read no sermonic or other criticism of the fulmination by the venerable ex-president of Harvard equaling in interest the group of letters on the subject which appears on another page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These communications state the case clearly and logically, and give expression to the verdict which is even now uppermost in the minds of a great majority of those who have given the subject serious consideration. We need hardly point out that practically all of the writers of these letters are men who, by training and association, are qualified to speak on matters theological with a certain degree of authority. They emphasize, with remarkable unanimity, the general verdict and show the folly of an attempt to eliminate from the religion of to-day the personality of God, the divine character and mission of Jesus Christ, the office of the Holy Spirit and the authority of Scripture. But religion is and always has been more largely a thing of the heart and the life than of the head. Intellectual beliefs and philosophies rise and flourish and pass away, while Christianity remains, to draw the souls of men, to lift them up from dull materialism to a higher spiritual plane and to invest their lives with noble purposes, God-ward and man-ward. Contrast this with the "New Religion" as Dr. Eliot has outlined it—a religion which, as Professor Hodges of Cambridge, one of our correspondents, writes, "may suffice for gentlemen of good education and comfortable income, who are in good health and spirits and who live in or near Boston; but to the plain people it makes no appeal."

"Common folks," said Lincoln, "are the most of folks." The religion of Jesus, which the common people of his day "heard gladly," was spurned and belittled by the scholars and churchmen of that time, just as it is now being assailed by some who place intellectuality above spirituality.

The Situation in Spain

POLITICAL disturbances have been breaking out recently in the most unexpected places and from causes which could hardly have been foreseen by the most sagacious statesmen. Now that fuller reports have come in, owing to the relaxation of the censorship, it appears that the insurrection in Spain was not aimed at the dynasty represented by King Alfonso, or to place on the throne Don Jaime, the pretender to the crown, who, at last reports, was safe in the Alps. Older statesmen of Europe, who remember the bloody Carlist wars a few decades ago, thought that there must be either one or the other as the underlying cause. Doubtless, if the revolutionists in Barcelona had been more successful, a rising by the supporters of the late Don Carlos would probably have occurred.

The dislike of a large number of otherwise loyal people to the war in Morocco was fanned into open revolt by the thousands of malcontents, gathered from every part of Europe, who have made their headquarters in Barcelona. They showed that they wished to strike at the very base of every-day society and do away with authority by whatever name it was called. There is a widespread impression that the war was to aid a mining company, which had interests in the Moorish country, some distance from Melilla. The mines cannot be operated unless the Moors in its neighborhood are subdued. The Moors, so far, have had the best of the situation, and the Spaniards are drawn within their fortifications. Whatever the primary cause of the trouble, there now seems to be no other course open to Spain than to use all of her resources to restore order in North Africa, as well as in Catalonia, and maintain her sovereignty over Melilla and other towns long in her possession. To leave them would damage her prestige irreparably in the eyes of Europe and encourage the tribesmen to further attacks in other directions. Morocco so far, in the last three years, has caused grave anxiety to Germany, France and Spain.

GENERAL NOTES

—THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN have discovered that certain active members of the National and International Councils are defenders of Mormonism. A movement is on foot to get them out of the Councils.

—RADIUM, THE SCIENTISTS tell us, is worth $9,000,000 a pound. A London concern has placed an order with a mining company in Cornwall for a quarter of an ounce of pure radium, at the fabulous figure of $750,000. This is more than all the laboratories of the world own at the present time, so the order is likely to remain unfilled indefinitely.

—THE GREAT JUBILEE held in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the opening up of Japan was a notable event, lasting three days. People poured into Tokyo and Yokohama from all directions, two hundred thousand coming in to the latter city from nearby towns and villages. While the native celebration was in progress the missionaries made active propaganda, holding meetings daily and distributing loads of religious literature.

Earthquake Shakes Mexico

CENTRAL Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Queretaro on the north to Oaxaca on the south, an area of more than a thousand square miles, was shaken by a series of the most severe earth shocks felt in that region for the last twenty-five years. The damage caused in Mexico City was much greater than was at first supposed. The cathedral was so badly damaged that it had to be condemned. The walls of many buildings were cracked. The American school was rendered unsafe. Some of the water mains were broken, and the water supply was seriously curtailed. But the stroke fell heaviest on Acapulco and Chilpancingo, which were destroyed. March is the only month during this year in which there has not been a serious shaking of the surface of the earth somewhere. Beginning with the first throes of the Messina disaster, in last December, there has scarcely a day passed in which there has not been some notable trembling of the earth. The slaughter which began in Italy, in the destruction of 120,000 lives by earthquake, has continued its bloody work until the horror in Mexico.

The time was when earthquakes and similar calamities were counted as judgments which an angry God visited upon his disobedient creatures. Science and the Bible both protest against such a misinterpretation of divine Providence. Under the plans of the divine Creator and Ruler we have our home on the earth, which is a ball of fire, with only a little of its crust cooled; the process of cooling is still going on, in which the crust sinks, the gases expand and the convulsions follow. There are certain parts of the earth well known to the geographer and geologist which are more liable to these disturbances than others, and when people build their structures and found their homes and seek their fortunes in these localities they have to take the chances of the perils that are possible. These fearful disasters have a bright side to their dark picture in the beautiful examples of individual heroism in rescue and patience and in the widespread philanthropy which it awakens in the hearts of the local communities and the nations of the earth, giving a superb illustration of the brotherhood of the race and the Fatherhood of God. Our heavenly Father means that good shall come to the individual heart from these awful calamities by turning its attention away from the earthly things that perish to the heavenly things that abide. The apostle Paul gives a reason for the spiritual benefits of the misfortunes of life.

For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. (II. Cor. 4 : 17, 18.)

Mexico City, Which Suffered Heavily During the Recent Earthquake

Barely Saved

Robert Taylor, night engineer of No. 14 colliery of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, at Plainsville, Pa., had a narrow escape from drowning the other day. He had gone alone to repair a broken pump, and his hand became caught in the machinery in such a way that he could not free himself. He shouted for help, but no one heard him. A few minutes after his hand became entangled Taylor noticed that the water was leaking in the tunnel. He realized that unless the flow was checked the tunnel would be filled with water and he would be drowned. He shouted until he lost control of his vocal chords, and could not utter a sound above a hoarse whisper. For four hours he stood a prisoner, his hand torn from his efforts to release himself. By the time the water reached his lips he had been compelled to stand on tiptoe to prevent suffocation. Workmen who had been puzzled by his disappearance shut off the water, and, entering the tunnel, found and released him.

This engineer had what the world would call a close call. A few moments more of delay on the part of the rescuers and he would have been drowned. There are many people who have gone to the extreme limit of danger; they have caught the arm in some machinery of earthly misfortune or of moral evil, they are on tiptoe and the water is up to their lips. There is necessity of haste on the part of God's children everywhere that those in direst peril who are nearest the other life and its issues be rescued at once. The good Book makes reference to some who got into the kingdom of heaven with no margin to spare.

He himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire. (I. Cor. 3 : 15.)

Blind Boy's Heroism

Blind Henry Gilbert, aged twelve years, his brother John, two years younger, and a number of playmates went swimming in a quarry hole near Philadelphia, Pa., where the water was six feet deep. After they decided to come out, little John Gilbert took a farewell plunge, and did not come to the surface quickly. The silence of the other boys attracted the attention of Henry, the sightless brother, who by this time was dressed and inquiring where John was. He then heard a faint cry for help. Directed by the sound of the cry, he jumped into the water and swam to the rescue. By the time he reached the place where his brother had gone down, John had disappeared again. Henry waited until John came to the surface and again, directed by the boy's cries, managed to grasp him, and, guided by the boys' voices on the shore, the blind rescuer swam with his brother to safety.

It might have been well for the parents of these children, if living, to have had a more careful supervision of their whereabouts and doings. The recklessness of swimmers in the summertime has become a national calamity, if not a shame; yet we are compelled to forget the recklessness of these little fellows in the sublime heroism of the rescue by this blind boy. Large as are the fountains of heroism in the heart of the average small boy, not one in a thousand under the circumstances would have done as Henry Gilbert did. It was the undying love he had for his brother which made him forget himself, which, by the way, is an excellent example to the cold-hearted and selfish in this world. Love that is intense enough and courage that is strong enough will overcome most handicaps, and do pretty nearly everything they wish in blessing and saving the bodies, minds and souls of men. A professed love upward toward God, to be genuine, must carry with it a love outward for fellow-men.

He that loveth his brother abideth in the light. (I. John 2 : 10.)

Kaiser Greets Young Men

The World's Conference of the Young Men's Christian Association, held at Barmen-Elberfeld, Germany, in July, was a wonderful gathering in the character and influence of its delegates and in the ability and enthusiasm manifested in the discussions. When the reports from the various countries of the world were received, the one from the United States evoked the greatest enthusiasm. This report showed that there are 1,934 organizations, 446,000 members, and $50,000,000 of Young Men's Christian Association property. The figures for the entire world were 7,823 organizations, 821,000 members and $60,000,000 in property. One of the most notable addresses of the conference was made by a Chinaman, who said among other things: "China is awakening, and sending its best men to see the best ideas in every country." The Kaiser sent the following telegram: "The blessings of God on the conference work for the welfare of the rising generation." The idea of the salvation of young men by young men has been singularly blessed by divine Providence. The evangelical characteristic has been its greatest blessing and the reason of its largest success, although it has paid a due proportion of attention to the physical, mental and social wants of young men. The spirit of the times, the vast amount of money required to maintain the work, especially in the large cities, have led some of the Y. M. C. A.'s to lay a greater emphasis upon the gymnastic and literary departments of the institution than formerly. It is a serious question in the minds of the best workers and friends of the Association whether a deviation from the original evangelistic intention would not be a mistake, if not a danger, to the largest success of the cause which has wrought such miracles of good among the young men of our land. The heart is the fountain of life, and if that shall be properly cared for other things can be adjusted with comparative ease. There have been few more beautiful and inspiring pictures in the history of Christian toil in the last fifty years than the intense zeal manifested by consecrated young men in the Young Men's Christian Association for the salvation of their fellow-men, and no skill in athletic training, or number of classes in valuable instruction, or committees on social betterment or musical or other entertainments, important as they are, ought to be allowed to become a substitute for an absence of the work of soul saving, on whose idea the organization was founded and which it has for a half century incarnated.

I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. (I. John 2 : 14.)

Conscience Compels Confession

James Hunter Wright appeared before Magistrate Crane in New York City, and announced that he was ready to plead to an indictment at once. He said the sooner he began serving a term in State's prison, as an atonement for his crimes, the better satisfied he would feel. A charge was made against him and he was committed to the Tombs in $1,000 bail. Wright was a partner in several art studios and stores. When business would get a little slack, he would burn out the stock, collect the insurance and start at a new business in another place. In describing his feelings he says:

That silent monitor, which tells us when we have done right or wrong, began to work in a little way at first, and then its condemnation overwhelmed me and I became the most miserable of God's creatures. I could not work, I could not sleep, a voice kept urging me to confess my crimes and secure relief. I was too cowardly to end my life.

I am perhaps the happiest man in prison. I know now the satisfaction that comes to those who do right. I did not confess until after a terrible battle had been fought between my criminal instincts and conscience. It was an awful struggle. I knew there was not the slightest chance of my ever being convicted for any crime I had committed, yet with this knowledge I have suffered more than the torture of a thousand years under the thumbscrew during the last two years by the persistent appeals of my conscience to acknowledge the wrongs I have done and pay the penalty.

The trial has not been had and his case is yet to be permanently disposed of, but that man's story only illustrates the intolerable agonies of a guilty conscience. God's government is eternally righteous, and the conscience of his creatures is his voice telling them the right from the wrong; commending the one and condemning the other.

Which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another. (Rom. 2:15.)

Leading Minds on the "New Religion"

DR. ELIOT'S "New Religion" has already furnished a theme for hundreds of preachers in American pulpits. It has been a subject of universal criticism in the newspapers and magazines. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invited a number of the ablest and clearest-headed theologians to express their views on Dr. Eliot's pronouncement, and we print their communications below. We commend these letters to the thoughtful consideration of our readers. They represent enlightened religious opinion, expressed without prejudice, and show very clearly what the attitude of educators, teachers and preachers is toward the New Religion.

True Religion Must Have an Uplift

By PRESIDENT W. E. HUNTINGTON, Boston University.

President Eliot has been a great force in the educational interests of the nation during the past forty years. No man can hold a primacy in leadership in several distinct domains of thought; his greatness has not been manifest in the realm of religious or theological thinking. I cannot think that he expects a "new religion" in the sense that the fundamentals of Christianity are to be replaced or discarded; if he does—"nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure." He cannot object to an "authority" that abides in the centre and heart of the truth which Jesus affirmed was incarnated in his own divine life. This "authority" is ancient and everlasting. When the Saviour himself declared his oneness with the Father it is certainly not "deification" if his Church offers him the adoration that his nature and work for the world demand from grateful and loving hearts.

It is late in the day to hint to the Christian world that monotheism is endangered by a philosophy of religion which holds to a fundamental belief in the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit; although philosophy may have no plummet to sound the unfathomed mystery of the Godhead.

Biblical descriptions of the moral status of the human race are confirmed by every generation; in some way mankind has found itself in a condition far below the divine ideals for human life—whether by "a fall," as the Genesis story depicts, or by any other catastrophe—mankind is down, and must be lifted. The whole meaning of the Christian revelation centres in the necessity of this uplift.

Protestantism holds with tender regard to two sacraments; because these two embody and express significant spiritual truth. Mystical notions of their efficacy in improving the moral character of those who use them will probably disappear in time, but the simple rites of baptism and the Eucharist will abide in the Church.

Dogma is likely to be simplified, but not wholly abandoned. The intellectual demand in religion must be in some way satisfied; but the credo may suffer change from age to age.

It is not a "new" notion that the Christian religion is summarized in the great inclusive doctrine of "love to God and service to one's fellowmen." Christ had much to say of this essential. W. E. HUNTINGTON.

Christ and the Law of Liberty

By PRESIDENT WARFIELD, Lafayette College, Pennsylvania

I am always glad to express my confidence in the finality and the truth of the revelation of Jesus Christ. So far from sympathizing with the current of contemporary criticism of authority in religion, I find in the authority asserted alike by the prophets of the Old Testament and Jesus Christ, for the one only and true God, the closest bond that binds Christianity to the scientific thought of our time, which emphasizes the reign of absolute, beneficent law throughout the universe, as inevitable in physics as in physiology, in chemistry as in the moral order. It is in the person of Jesus Christ, however, that we are made to know that this law is the will of a loving and intelligent Ruler, who made, upholds and directs all law to his own glory and the welfare of all his creatures.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot
President of Harvard University

The perfect submission of Jesus Christ to law, his recognition that it was neither blind fate nor mere physical compulsion, but the will of his heavenly Father, is that law of liberty which in every sphere of activity makes the law-abiding person find "authority" not a bond to bind, but a power to remove every obstacle to free and joyous action.

And in all of this, resulting as it largely does from meditation and reflection upon the loftiest themes of philosophy, there is no withdrawal from the hard facts of human experience. I blink not the fact of sin, I do not shut my study door and try to forget it. I go down into the multitude, rejoicing to find evidence of the response of men to the offer of God's free grace, and grieving that so many resist the pleading of his Spirit. I confidently believe that Jesus Christ is able to save every one from sin who will accept his grace.

ETHELBERT D. WARFIELD.

Not a Religion—But a Philosophy

By PROF. HODGES, Cambridge Theological School

I have the greatest respect for any religion which satisfies Mr. Eliot. As I read the reports of what he has said, I am convinced of the truth of his position—as far as it goes. I have also the highest respect for the dialogues of Plato and for the symphonies of Beethoven. But I am glad for my own sake, and for the sake of many of my neighbors, that there are other things to read beside Plato and other things to hear beside the music of Beethoven.

Mr. Eliot's religion may suffice for gentlemen of good education and comfortable income, who are in good health and spirits and live in or near Boston. But to the plain people it makes no appeal. It lacks the three essential qualities which make a missionary religion: mystery, authority and personality. Dismissing authority, it sets every man the impossible task of reasoning out a creed. Depreciating the personality of Jesus Christ as the manifestation of God, it takes away that strong provision of personal loyalty which makes religion real and efficient for so many people. It is not a religion, it is a philosophy for philosophers. GEORGE HODGES.

Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.

Not a New Religion, But Unitarianism

PRESIDENT A. J. ROBERTS, of Colby College

I am not a theologian, but Dr. Eliot's recent address on "The New Religion" seems to me but a prophecy of the growth and spread of Unitarianism. So far as I can see, the address is nothing more than an effective statement of the well-known tenets of that sect DR. A. J. ROBERTS.

Christianity Has Nothing to Fear

Reversing the Wheels of Progress

By PRESIDENT A. E. SMITH, Ohio Northern University

It would be unkind to assail the great name of Dr. Eliot; but a natural religion, foisted on the world in the twentieth century, would certainly be reversing the wheels of progress and attempting to renew the race by old experiments, which have long since failed. To eliminate Jesus Christ, the supernatural, and the mysterious in the moral regeneration of the world, is either supreme folly or the proof of senility. ALBERT EDWIN SMITH.

The Race Demands Divine Leadership

By PASTOR SHELDON, Topeka, Kan.

Neither Dr. Eliot nor any other capable prophet can change the nature of man's religious foundations. As I understand Dr. Eliot's "new religion," it is nothing more nor less than the old humanitarianism, which has been tried and found wanting as a basic religion. The nature of man will always demand a personal divine leadership, authority and example. That is the very heart of Christianity, and always has been. A religion stripped of the personal authority and credal faith that centre about Jesus Christ as the God-man cannot reach, or save, or satisfy humanity.

As to the extent of the influence which Dr. Eliot's remarks will have on the religious situation, in my opinion it will not affect it one way or the other. There are several conflicting theories about the sources of the sun's heat. Meanwhile, I notice this summer that the sun keeps steadily at its business, just the same. There are a good many attacks being made on Christianity all over the world; but, meanwhile, I notice Christ and his teaching are doing their steady redeeming work and growing in power every year. "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, yea, and forever."

CHARLES M. SHELDON.

THE APOSTLE PAUL ON CHRISTIAN LOVE

By Mrs. M. Baxter

LOVE is the real meaning of "charity," the word used in the Authorized Version. Love is the very breath and life of the true body of Christ. Not human love, which loves only that which pleases it; but divine love, which loved us when we were enemies. "God is love," and real, divine love can only exist in us as God himself dwells in us (I. John 4:16). The divine Godhead consists of three persons in a holy, perfect unity. The body of Christ consists of many members (not of church members on church registers, but of those who are as vitally connected with him by the same divine life which Christ lived on earth in a human body, imparted to them by the Holy Ghost dwelling in them. No human institution, however good, can create such a unity. There are all kinds of brotherhoods, communities, societies, guilds, etc., formed by man; but the one common life which would make them inseparable is to be found nowhere outside God.

Paul had just been speaking of the body of Christ in I. Cor. 12:12, 13. He made the remarkable statement: "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also the Christ" (Gr.). He is not only the Head, but the entire Head and body. It is God himself who, by his own Holy Spirit, joins members to the body of Christ, and that, by a baptism, a burying with Christ; for it is only such as have been crucified with Christ, and have died to themselves and to the world in his death, who are risen with Christ into another life, another personality; not I, but Christ. And as the life and being of self is I, so the life and being of the body of Christ is not I, but Christ; not I, but my fellow-members. As buried and risen with Christ, we exist no longer for ourselves, but as part of the Christ, in a world which knows him not.

In this light of our relations to him let us read this "Love Chapter." Paul has been speaking in the whole of I. Cor. 12, of the gifts of the Spirit in relation to the body of Christ; the chapter closes with the words, "Covet earnestly the best gifts; and yet I show unto you a more excellent way; though I speak with tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am become sounding brass or a clanging cymbal," i. e., a meaningless sound. Speaking with tongues and other gifts without the love which is the very presence of the Holy Spirit in our hearts is no more glory to God in one of his children than it is in a heathen. "Without love," Paul says, "I am nothing." What, then, is this divine love, this essence of the life and character of our divine Master? "Love suffereth long, and is kind." Human nature may endure, but that endurance wears out in the long run—a reaction comes, and it is replaced by bitterness. Human nature is a fallen, ruined thing; it is only eternal life within us that can suffer long and be kind. It is human nature to seek its own, sooner or later; it cannot forget how it is treated and what is due to it. But the life of Christ, the true love-life, "seeketh not her own," and therefore envieth not; for love wants nothing for herself. She is not puffed up: how can she be? Divine love seeks nothing so much as that Christ shall be exalted, at any cost to her, and this is not by a rigid self-mortification; it is just the sunlight of God streaming in through a being yielded up to him; as the summer sun streams in through doors and windows which are all open to it.

Busy Times in Housekeeping

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

As the summer fruits ripen, from the berries that come earliest to the pears and quinces that arrive latest, the notable housewife has her hands full in preserving them for the winter table. Notwithstanding the fact that jams, jellies and canned fruits may be purchased at reasonable prices and in great variety, the old-fashioned home mother holds firmly to the opinion that none of these products compare in toothsome flavor with those prepared in her own kitchen. As the shelves of her storeroom are gradually filled with lucent syrups and fruits that gleam in amber or crimson beauty, the matron has a sense of satisfaction. She who has at hand on a winter day preserved peaches and pears, blackberries and raspberries, grapes and quinces, is aware that no sudden visitation will find her at a loss. Whoever cannot make a wholesome and appetizing meal on a slice of cold ham, good bread and butter and peach preserves is a being to be pitied. Such a luncheon might be set before a king, and he would find himself a guest at a feast.

No woman of experience or faculty takes too strenuously the labor of making preserves. The first requisite is to select perfect fruit; the next to begin the work early in the day and to clear the field for the time of less important tasks. Long before this meets the eye of the provident housewife who reads this page her closet will be lined with jars of strawberry and blackberry jam; huckleberries and gooseberries will be canned to await the season of pies in cold weather, and her currant jelly will rival in clearness and beauty the jeweled beads that glistened on their slender threads on the Fourth of July. Every direction handed down by family tradition or written in the dainty script of an accomplished grandmother or great-aunt will have been followed conscientiously, and the practical advice of Marion Harland, Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. Rorer will have served as aids in emergency to the novice in this branch of housewifery. Still, frost is far in advance, and until its sharpness is in the atmosphere and the snowflakes fall from a gray and lowering sky the work of preserving may go on.

Having selected the best fruit, the woman is wise who does not attempt too much. Her scales, her sugar, her jars, her preserving kettle and her fruit conveniently arranged, if she can content herself with doing eight or ten jars at a time and leaving the work before she is exhausted, she will have better results than she will gain by undertaking too difficult a campaign and trying to fill her pantry shelves too rapidly. Covered with paraffine paper and hermetically sealed, preserves should last indefinitely. This, however, is not to be expected if there is a family of growing boys and girls who rush in hungry for wholesome food, after a romp in the keen outdoor air or a day in the schoolroom. Preserves are not made to last, but to be eaten. As contributions to the diet of invalids, as helpful adjuncts to the daily dessert, as gifts to friends who board, and as additions to the box sent periodically to the son or daughter at college, nothing exceeds in value conserves made by mother herself in her little kingdom of home.

Alas, for Feminine Taste!

While men are gravitating toward the beautiful, the pendulum in reference to women is swinging the other way. Nothing more hideous, more absolutely appalling than the hats of the hour was ever offered mortal women in the milliners' shops since millinery was known to the Western woman. In the immemorial East, women so long clung to veils and drapery that they escaped, and still escape, the snares that beset European and American women. Nothing in gowns, hats or bonnets is in the least pretty or attractive this season, and the matron on the ranch, the young girl on the prairie, the woman who has no neighbors and does not care how she dresses may well be thankful that in her simplicity she is not likely to make herself a fright.

We grow accustomed to fashions in dress, and cease to think them ugly when they become common. The matron who has lived long enough to remember the Grecian bend, the days of the immense hoop and the bustle that wrought havoc with womanly grace, smiles serenely as she sees sleeves retreating until arms are purple with cold in wintry weather, and then elongating themselves until they touch the knuckles of the hand, even in summer. To-day a woman's sleeve is as tight as a surgical bandage, to-morrow it may put itself out like a balloon. Whatever changes fashion decrees most of us adopt, if we can, and only the exceptional woman has the courage to look for the style that suits her and cling to it for the rest of her life. When a woman does this her friends think her eccentric. It requires courage to be thus sensible, when one belongs to no sisterhood and is neither a deaconess nor a Shaker.

A Hunter's Shack in the Wenaha Forest, Washington

STOCKMEN and settlers living on lands adjacent to the forest reserves in southeastern Washington, northeastern Oregon and the Idaho-Washington border are organizing to hunt gray wolves, bears, cougars and other predatory animals, which annually cause losses to owners of sheep, cattle, colts and poultry in the districts south of Spokane. The Wenaha national forest in Washington and Oregon is patrolled by one ranger, who is unable to cover the ground. The Federal government has set aside $2,000 to employ experienced hunters in the Coeur d'Alene forest, where a systematic hunt will begin early in August. Meantime the settlers are using trained dogs, guns, traps and poison to exterminate the pests. The several States pay bounties on wolves, cougars and other predatory animals.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—WILL SOME correspondent kindly send Aunt Prudence Payson the entire text of the hymn of which the following is a stanza:

"When the evening shadows gather
And the long day's work is done;
When we reach the unknown country
Out beyond the setting sun;
After all the weary waiting,
In the peaceful rest to share,
No more need of anguished parting;
We shall know each other there."

—C. P. You are annoyed because an acquaintance whom you had not recently met did not recognize you when you spoke to her after church. Many people have adopted the plan of mentioning their names when they meet a friend of whose recollection they are not sure. I advise you to try this in future.

The Two Processions

SIX days in the week, as punctual to the hour as the rising and setting of the sun, two processions wend their way through city streets. Some good people who are always hoping to improve on things as they are have been advocating a change in our midsummer reckoning of time. Their proposition is so to alter the face of the clock that the working day may begin and end two hours earlier than at present. In other words, they would start the wheels of labor and business at five in the morning, calling it seven, and send the toilers home at three in the afternoon, calling it five. This might or might not prove a practical and beneficial arrangement for the working man and the working woman. It would not in the least abridge the period of daily toil, and it would probably increase rather than diminish the hardships of the women who stay at home. So far as modern civilization is concerned, provided as it is with every possible convenience and invention for the saving of labor, it still remains true that

Man works from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done.

No arbitrary alteration of the clock will bring much relief to the farmer's wife who cooks for hired men or caters for summer boarders. It cannot be trusted either to ameliorate the lot of the mother with a teething baby or of a mechanic's wife who keeps the house tidy and has dinner ready for her good man on his return from the shop.

The two processions, one setting out from home in the morning and the other going back to the home in the evening, tell a tale of sacrifice and self-denial as old as Eden. In the sweat of his brow man was to eat his bread; by the sweat of his brow, the aching of his muscles and the tension of his brain he forever earns his bread. One sees early in the day brave and cheery faces turned toward the shop, the counting-room and the department store. Long lines of young girls marching two by two, or in groups of three, or now and then alone, stretch toward the factory or the department store. The men tramp sturdily onward, old men and young men, scholars, students or unlettered and ignorant. Alike they seek the daily work and the daily wage for the sake of the dear ones at home. After five o'clock the procession starts again, marching over the same ground that it traversed eight or nine hours ago. Now many faces are haggard, many eyes look weary, but the smile of cheer is as brave as ever, and one is impressed by the haste and hurry that impels the forward rush of the returning hosts.

It is the ardor to prevent a moment's delay, the eagerness to catch the first possible train or ferry that turns these law-abiding, home-loving and usually amiable husbands, fathers and brothers into fiends as they storm a bridge or other terminal. Men who would scorn to be rude to a woman in ordinary circumstances elbow her out of the way, precisely as if they were engaged in a game of football; old and feeble men are thrust violently aside, and infirmity has no chance whatever. This reckless and furious haste is the one sad feature of our home-returning procession. It will never be lessened in brutality by the crowd in a mass. Policemen and railway guards are powerless to improve the condition. Only as man by man, individually, determines to restrain himself may we hope for a much-needed reformation.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

"IRESPONSIBLE for Marco's success?" said Preston in astonishment. "Why, I haven't seen the boy for eight years. I just missed him both in Paris and Berlin, when I was there; and you know I was called home suddenly."

"But you saw a great deal of him before, here in New York," the girl reminded him, meaningly. "Mrs. Fernald told me all about that first trip which he took with them; how tractable he was, how earnestly he studied with his tutor, and how hard he tried to improve in every way. She said they found out, after a time, that it was all because of you. It was something you said to him just before he sailed, and he said he was trying to do it: he was trying to be red, white and blue to you, to himself and to—God."

The girl's voice broke a little, and there was a moment's pause. Across the table the young man did not speak. He was too deeply moved for words.

"And so that was the secret of it," resumed the girl, softly, "and you can imagine that the good doctor did not let your work go untended and unwatched. He was always there to help and guide. He never told you all this, perhaps, for he hardly had the chance, as he died so soon after that trip, while still abroad. But the boy—surely he wrote you sometimes?"

Preston smiled oddly.

"Oh, yes, he wrote me—after a fashion; but he was nearly always reserved in his speech, and still more so with his pen; and about his real self he wrote little. I have kept his letters. Taken from first to last, they are a most illuminating commentary on his progress, if nothing more. I took out the first and the last one this morning to look at them. Perhaps you would like to see them—as a study in contrasts," he suggested, taking from his pocket two letters and handing them across the table.

And Florence read first:

"DEER SIR: I'm havin' a Bully time. How far down does this Water go. Good by. Your friend, MARCO."

The second letter, after the preliminaries of date and address, was:

"DEAR MR PRESTON: I sail the tenth from Cherbourg on the Caspian. Aside from my father's, there is just one face in all America that I am longing to see—yours.

"As ever, with the most heartfelt appreciation of all you have done for me, I am, Faithfully yours,

"MARCO COVINO."

"What a strong, fine hand he writes," mused the girl, admiringly. Then, with a mischievous smile, she demanded: "Do you realize, sir, what it would mean to countless autograph hunters to get a letter with that signature? Why, that man is the idol of half Europe, and bids fair to be of this country, as well."

"Yes, I know," returned Preston, uncomfortably. "That's where the duckling comes in."

Florence laughed.

"But are his letters always so short, and to the point?" she asked.

"Usually. Oh, of course, there have been longer ones. For instance, from the first he insisted that Dr. Fernald should keep a strict account of what was paid out for him, and he was equally careful to do so for himself, later on. With the first money he earned he began to pay me back. The letters about that time were longer, of course."

"And is he—er—out of debt, now?"

"Entirely, so far as I am concerned," replied Preston, with a whimsical smile. "I believe there is a matter of eight dollars and forty cents which he still owes to a Mrs. Martin, somewhere. He sent me an elaborate explanation at the first to the effect that, although this eight dollars and forty cents was the older debt, he did not intend to pay it until he returned to this country."

"'Eight dollars and forty cents!'—and the great Covino!" exclaimed Florence. "What a bundle of contradictions he must be! I long to meet him!" she cried, as she rose from the table. "And you say he has paid you all back?" she added, leading the way to the library.

"Yes," rejoined the man. "As was natural, I suppose, with such talent, he responded to instruction with a promptness that very soon placed him on the road to really great playing. Of course that sort of thing couldn't be hid, and it was not long before he was supplementing his studies with playing for money—and good money, too. Little by little his fame grew, until last year his performance of that Tschaikowsky concerto at Berlin set the whole musical world in a furore. You know the rest—and so does every one else. Since then, his every move has been chronicled in the daily press. Really, I don't know as the boy has bought a pair of shoes that some one hasn't reported it!"

"I wonder how he likes that part of it," mused the girl aloud.

"Not much, I fancy," laughed Preston, a sudden vision coming to him of a small boy peering from behind a picture in his studio and demanding: "Be they gone yet?" "Of course, now he gets fabulous prices for his playing," the young man continued. "For some time he has been really embarrassing me by sending money to be spent for his father."

"Sure enough, there was a father—and he's still living, it appears."

"Oh, yes. He has a beautiful room and all possible comforts in a private hospital over on Riverside Drive. The man is greatly changed; but he cannot live much longer, I fear. It was a terrific struggle at first, with disease and his appetite for drink both to fight. He was at a sort of reformatory-sanatorium when Marco went away. Gradually he began to improve so that he could really work a good deal out of doors, among the flowers and about the grounds. He developed a real genius for that sort of thing, too, and we thought we'd solved the problem. But last year he began to go back again. Something new set in, and he had to go to the hospital for treatment. Really, I think the only thing that's kept him alive is his love for Marco, and his intense interest in the boy's success. The nurse tells me that he treasures every word he can find about him in the papers. He is so wild to see his son that she fears the result of the meeting."

"The poor man! But joy doesn't often kill; does it? No wonder he's proud of his son. He's not the only one, either, who is 'wild' to see him. Judging from the papers, New York itself is merely killing time until next Tuesday night, when he plays. I'm not sure but I'm a little 'wild' myself to meet him," she added. "It all seems so like a wonderful fairy tale."

"It is a regular Aladdin's Lamp tale," retorted Preston, rising to leave the room; "only the trouble is, now that I have rubbed the lamp, I'm afraid of the genius I've evoked. Anyhow, there's nothing to do but to go to Tommy wants to go swimming.

Let him go!

Give him a towel and a cake of Ivory Soap and let him go.

Thus you will achieve a double purpose—the boy will have his swim which is good; and his bath, which is better.

For the bath there is nothing quite so good as Ivory Soap. It is pure, it lathers freely, rinses easily and leaves the skin as smooth as satin.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Ivory Soap . . . . . It Floats.

A Double Duty Fly Trap

PYRAMIDS mean fly protection as well as fly destruction. Hang them anywhere—on your chandeliers—near your pictures—wherever flies gather.

Pyramid Fly Catchers

Flypaper is confined to tables and stands—catches only the wandering fly—and its unclean, sticky surface is a constant menace to people's clothing, etc.

PYRAMIDS expose their surfaces slowly and automatically. Thus, their power of attraction is constantly renewed. Also, they have two gummed surfaces against flypaper's one—are doubly effective—more economical—last longer.

Try them. Write to-day, naming your grocer, and enclose 10 cents in stamps. Two PYRAMIDS will be sent by return mail.

AMONG THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Relief in Sorrow*

THERE is no more convincing proof of the constant care of Providence over each individual than the impartial manner in which sorrow and joy are meted out to us all. A few seem to escape trouble for a while; sometimes a man is observed whose life seems to be barren of delight; but for both classes the long lane turns at last, the blow falls or the pleasure dawns, and often in a full measure which strikes the average. There are doubtless exceptions to this rule, but they are rare.

Occasionally one is found who illogically denies the interest of Providence in the trifles of daily life. One such person, a highly educated and generally sensible woman, has been heard to assert that she should despise a Deity that troubled himself concerning the petty details of human existence; and yet this woman is an expert microscopist. It seems incredible that she should not accord as high honor to the Creator and Controller of the infinitely multiplied minute life of the globe as to the Ruler of the thunders and of the planets. Are we not told that the very hairs of our heads are all numbered?

Thus it savors not at all of irreverence, but rather of the deepest love and confidence, that we should attribute to our Maker the most complete interest in our individual lives. We are afflicted, as were the sisters of Bethany; but then Christ usually comes to us also, with comfort and cheer, or, as the sublime prophet-poet expresses it, the Sun of Righteousness arises with healing in his wings.

So universally is this doctrine accepted, of the alternating joy and sorrow of each human soul, that many of our philosophers, both religious and irreligious, have written learned articles exploiting and explaining it. One of the most dreamy and beautiful of these is Mrs. Meynell's Rhythm of Life, but she does not explicitly regard this "rhythm" as the expression of God's care and goodness. To the true Christian, it forms one of the strongest links in the chain that binds us to him.

The methods of different ages differ. Fifty or a hundred years or more ago, it was a common thing for conversion to come to the human soul through awful agony. The lives of Wesley, Whitefield, Edwards, Finney, and others of the great evangelistic preachers of former times, are filled with stories of such conversions. For days, sometimes for weeks, sinners wrestled with their consciences in agonies of repentance. Then, in a clear and almost miraculous manner, peace would come to them and they would feel themselves accepted of God.

In our day, the Spirit more often visits the unconverted as a still, small voice in the soul. Sometimes it is purely through the prompting of reason and duty that the man comes to Christ. But there was something grand in that stormy old way—the awful gloom and warfare—succeeded by the rich sweetness of peace. In our modern method, Christ's wonderful simile of the new birth can be less readily applied and understood, though it may be no less real and true.

As Gipsy Smith says, "This is an old story, but it is the only story." The resurrection of Lazarus is to be used by us as a figure showing forth the raising of the soul from the death of sin into the life of righteousness. The turning of grief to joy in his home is but a type of the personal ecstasy which must follow in every case the right settlement of the relations between God and the soul.

Our Cosmopolitan Population*

SO vital is the immigration question to our national life, and so varied are the considerations that pertain to it, that there is probably scarcely a college or high school in America in which it has not been publicly debated.

The arguments for a highly restricted immigration usually fall before those for a very liberal law, in which only paupers, the diseased or defective, felons and dangerous characters are excluded.

No nation has ever before been exposed to the peculiar trials resulting from an influx of immigrants, largely untaught, and coming at the rate of about a million a year. We have had to learn by hard experience how to deal with our problem, and the half has not yet been mastered.

The worst of the struggle has fallen to the share of the metropolis, where most of these new-comers land. Certain classes, usually the best, migrate at once to the West or South, where there is plenty of room for them. The corrupt condition of New York City politics, at which the rest of the country is so profoundly shocked, results largely from the enormous preponderance there of the foreign population—the dregs of the foreign immigration.

It is, therefore, naturally in New York that the greatest efforts are required to enlighten and purify these ignorant and usually simple people. It is only recently that this great need has been recognized. "Machine" politicians, thieves, promoters of vice, and other doubtful characters, were formerly the only outsiders on hand when every ship came in, to claim for their low purposes as many of the new-comers as they could get. Now, Christian workers are there to circumvent the wiles of the wicked, though they still hold the upper hand in far too many cases.

Mr. Wells rightly asserts that it is to the public schools that we must look for the uplifting of this heavy load. We cannot often coax these foreigners into our churches. Generally they herd by themselves, learning little English; but their children go to the public schools and there become imbued with American ideals, which are to a large extent Christian ideals.

Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York City, has made a careful comparison of the statistics as to crime, pauperism and illiteracy, of the five million and a half of foreign-born inhabitants, coming from countries that have parochial or church schools; and the similar statistics of 20,000,000 of inhabitants in twenty-one States of the republic where the American system of non-sectarian schools prevails. Mr. Hawkins shows that out of every 10,000 inhabitants the parochial or church system of education turned out 1,400 illiterates, 410 paupers and 160 criminals, while the non-sectarian public school system turned out 350 illiterates, 170 paupers and 75 criminals.

Every square mile on Manhattan Island has its average of 87,000 people, the majority of them of foreign birth. It is the place for the most vigorous home missionary effort. But every large town has also its foreign contingent, and you, young Christians, have a great work to do among them. If they go down to destruction their blood is upon your hands, and the hands of the Church at large.

In Dr. Jefferson's great sermon on the "Dangers of Liberty" he points out many of the temptations which beset these new-comers and the corresponding duties which devolve upon us. "The city," he says, "is a vast pool of Bethesda, where the porches are full of sick and impotent folk."

It is true, and we are appointed of our Lord to help and to heal them.

THE STORY OF MARCO

the boat to-morrow and meet this Signor Marco Covino."

"Oh, but he isn't 'Signor' at all," laughed Florence, "except when he has to be—in print, you know. Mrs. Fernald told me that he preferred to be 'Marco' to his friends, and 'Mister Covino' instead of 'Signor.' She says he's very fond of America, and of everything American."

"Good!" cried Preston, heartily, as he left the room to go to his studio.

CHAPTER XXX

UNSPOILED

PRESTON had no difficulty in recognizing the man he had come to meet. In the first place, the press-agent of the famous violinist had seen to it that the New York papers were well supplied with his likeness for at least a month before his arrival; and Preston had many times studied the pictured features and noted the changes that eight years of foreign training had wrought. If he had needed anything more he might have found it in the buzz of excited voices around him when Covino appeared, and in the adoring "There he is—I saw him in Paris last year!" from a very pretty girl who stood near by. As for Preston—Marco needed no enterprising press-agent nor admiring matinée girls to help him in the recognition. The young artist at twenty-nine had the same clear gray eyes and the same pointed bronze beard which had distinguished him eight years before; and in the shortest possible time the two men were clasping hands and gazing into each other's faces.

Just what they said first, neither one could have told afterward; and Preston knew only that he had not expressed half that was on his mind when he became unpleasantly aware that he had come to meet, not the unknown boy he had sent away, but a famous artist, to welcome whom half New York seemed to be waiting, in the shape of impatient managers, newspaper men, delegations of all sorts and sizes, and a curious public.

"I'll be out this evening after dinner, if I may come out to your house," laughed Marco, as he reluctantly turned from Preston's side. "I shan't ask you to come to me, for I want to get away from—this," he finished under his breath. And again Preston had a vision of a small boy peering from behind the picture in his studio and demanding, "Be they gone yet?"

At home Preston was met by the eagerly questioning eyes of Florence.

"Well?" she cried.

"Yes, it is 'well,' I think," smiled the man, "and very well, too. He's splendid—not spoiled a bit. He's as simple as the boy I used to know, and as fine as the man I hoped he'd be. He's coming out this evening, and you can see for yourself."

"To-night? Oh, what a shame! It's Polly's wedding, you know, and I have to be bridesmaid. I shan't see him."

THE PSALM OF LOVE*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE feel that we have a right to call letter-writing a divine art when we consider what a power for good are the epistles which we find in the Bible. It is given to us now to read and ponder only a portion of one of those epistles, one which was written by the apostle Paul to the Christians in Corinth. He wrote it during the time he was living in Ephesus, about five years after he had founded the church in Corinth. The portion assigned for our study has appropriately been called the "Psalm of Love," by whom we do not know.

Paul begins his letter to the Corinthians with gratulation for their Christian progress (I. Cor. 1:9). And then he proceeds to name faults possessed by them, just as one might point out flaws in a beautiful gem.

A lady purchased an opal in far-off Australia. She wrapped it in a piece of soft tissue paper, and laid it among her treasures; occasionally she took it out and examined it; looking at it at one angle, it seemed like a spark of fire; at another angle it appeared to be a blue sapphire; at another, a delicate emerald. So enraptured with it was she that she had not discovered a flaw in her gem, which was afterward pointed out by a friend. The flaw was, however, so small that the point of a pin would cover it.

The apostle Paul either saw for himself, or others pointed out to him, several flaws in his church-gem at Corinth. At this time we will mention only one: uncharitableness. This ugly blemish was produced by the fact that the church was composed of people of diverse nationalities—Jews, Greeks, etc. And not only this, but centres had been formed about certain teachers who had come to them, so that some said, "We are of Apollos," and others, "We are of Cephas." In I. Cor. 1:12 we seem to see that there were four of such parties. When a lapidary finds a fault in a gem he endeavors to overcome it by cutting and polishing, in which process the size of the gem is sometimes greatly reduced. But the apostle Paul proceeded more like the alchemist, who transforms rather than cuts as the lapidary does. And love was the element which he sought to mix with Corinthian Christianity, which would make it so sweet that "in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ they should be found blameless (I. Cor. 1:8).

If we will now take our Bibles and read the first thirteen verses of the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians, we will clearly see how Paul wrought his divine alchemy. Those who have the King James Version should substitute the word "love" of the Revised Version—"Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not," etc. If any there are who object to this, they must be reminded that the present-day idea of "charity"—which is alms-giving—does not at all coincide with what Paul wished to convey.

After the Psalm of Love has thus been read, let it be read again, by way of self-examination, in the following manner: I suffer long, and am kind. Do I? Am I? I envy not. Is that true of me? I vaunt not myself, do not boast. Can I say that of myself? I do not behave myself unseemly. I seek not my own good above that of others. Is that true? I am not easily provoked to anger or to harshness. What do others say of me in that regard? I take no account of evil; that is, I do not let revenge take possession of me. Is that true? I rejoice not in unrighteousness. Is it a fact that I do not indulge in sinful pleasures? I rejoice in the truth. Do I? I bear all things. Do I resent all words and acts that look like "lowering my dignity"? I believe all things, all good things, and I am therefore slow to accept evil reports concerning others. I hope all things. Do I? Am I accustomed to look on the bright side and believe that all things work together for good to those who love God? I endure all things. Is it a fact that I never allow my serenity to be disturbed by circumstances, or by people?

Do we not all need the Divine Alchemist, the Lord Jesus Christ, to put in our hearts the love of God to make us "blameless"? It is the only way, in fact, in which we can become blameless.

The apostle Paul, in his letter to the Corinthians, wrote that if they had not love they had nothing. He told them that all the knowledge they might gain, and gifts which they might possess, were to be counted as nothing compared with love; love to God, and love toward fellow-men, for those who love not their brethren have not the love of God in them. No wonder that Professor Drummond was led to say, "Love is the greatest thing in the world." We must believe that the apostle Paul had this thought ages before it was expressed by Professor Drummond. It was a fact in the world from the very beginning, and is a striking example of how men think God's thoughts after him.

Some one has said, "Let us read and think this thirteenth chapter of Corinthians every morning of our lives, and in so doing we will be helped to say more nearly what God would have us say; to do more nearly what God would have us do; to be more nearly what God would have us be."

Learn that to love is the one way to know
Or God, or man. JEAN INGELOW.

Let us stand at Niagara, and get an illustration of God's love and the love of human hearts. Dr. George F. Pentecost says:

"I can think of no better illustration of the relation of the Christian's love to the love of God than that which is afforded by the contemplation of the rising spray from the Falls of Niagara. Who that has stood beside that mighty cataract, and looked upon the boundless waters pouring, in a thundering torrent, over that stupendous precipice to the depths below, and watched the mist as it rises and floats upward and backward over the Falls, and outward over the waters and land, has not been charmed and filled with holy admiration as he has contemplated this parable in Nature? That mighty torrent of waters, pouring itself, with ceaseless and exhaustless energy, day and night into the river below, is what the love of God is to sinners. Who can measure it? Who can estimate it? The thin, and yet beautiful spray, arising from the foot of the Falls, is just a little of these same waters going back in grateful acknowledgment to the source whence it came. So is the believer's love to God. It is the rebound of his own love. Only a little, yea, only an infinitesimal portion given back to him who so loved us. As the spray does not rise by any forced effort of its own, so neither does the love of the believer go out to God by reason of any effort on his part. It ascends by a law of its own, that overcomes the downward law of gravity. The believer who stands under the Niagara of God's love, poured out through Christ, will not have to make an effort to love God; his love will ascend without effort. This is to "keep yourself in the love of God." If we draw near to the place

"BUNCOMBE"

It Don't Always Pay to be Skeptical

When a newspaper writer and proof reader that works nights can feed himself out of dyspepsia, which most all that class suffer with, it is worth while to know the kind of food used.

This man says:

"Being a newspaper writer and proof reader, also a graduate in medicine as well, though not practicing, makes a combination that would produce a skeptic on the subject if anything would.

"Day after day I read the proof on the Grape-Nuts advertisements with the feeling that they were all 'buncombe.' All this time I was suffering from dyspepsia from the improper food I was eating at the restaurant.

"One day I saw a package of Grape-Nuts at the restaurant and tried some with good, rich cream. The food took my fancy at once. After a few lunches at midnight I noted an improvement in my feelings, and was able to work with less fatigue.

"I have used Grape-Nuts as a regular diet since then, and have improved greatly. The old dyspepsia and bad feelings that I thought were necessary adjuncts to night work all disappeared, and I am able to do much more and better work with less effort than ever before.

"I was nearly ready to give up night work and seek health in some other walk in life, but thanks to my change in diet I am now all right." "There's a Reason."

BAD DREAMS
Caused by Coffee.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night, for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and were drinking Postum, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavor and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could wean every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug—ordinary coffee.

"People really do not appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of it would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned.

"A young lady friend of ours had stomach trouble for a long time, and could not get well as long as she used coffee. She finally quit coffee and began the use of Postum and is now perfectly well. Yours for health."

of God's manifested love, our hearts will be filled, and we cannot help, as we will not want to help, loving God. If we are far off from him, and do not draw near to him, our hearts will be as the waters far below the Falls; there will be no ascending spray."

When Mr. D. L. Moody organized his church, known as the "Illinois Street Mission," he had put in gas jets, just over the pulpit, the words, "God is Love." It was, of course, the most conspicuous thing in the church. One night, before the time of meeting, the door stood ajar; an intoxicated man, pausing, thought he might go in and get warm. He did not know what sort of a place it was, but when he pushed the door open he saw the text blazing out, "God is Love." He shut the door, and walked away, muttering to himself: "God is not love. If God is love, he would love me. God does not love a wretch like me." But it kept on burning down into his soul, "God is love; God is love." After a while he went back to the church, and took a seat in a corner. When Mr. Moody walked down the aisle after the meeting, he found the man weeping like a child. "What is the trouble?" he asked. "What was it in the sermon that touched you?" "I didn't hear a word of the sermon." "Well, what is the trouble?" "That text up there," he replied. Mr. Moody sat down, and from his Bible showed him the way of life, and the inquirer was saved.

Bolton Hall gathers together these estimates of life: "Life," said the belle, "is a jest that's just begun." "Life," said the pessimist, "is a cruel joke played upon us, by we know not whom." "Life," said the child, "is play." "Life," said the theologian, "is a vale of tears." "Life," said the Lord's Anointed, "life is love."

Love is the most enduring thing in the world. "Love never faileth," wrote Paul. Even human love has the quality of endurance. Mrs. Bottome told about a friend of her girlhood whom she had not seen for eighteen years. But one day, passing through the street, she saw her face at a second-story window, surrounded by a halo of prematurely gray hair. She ran upstairs, and into her friend's arms, and greeted her thus: "What has become of you all these years?" The answer was, "Come into the other room, and I will show you." There sat a boy, seventeen years of age, scarcely able to talk, a driveling idiot. His mother said, "My duty lies here with my darling boy." Mrs. Bottome thoughtlessly asked the question, "How can you endure it? I do not wonder you are prematurely gray." "It is no burden, no care, to live and serve my boy; and if some day he will only give me one sign that he recognizes me as his mother, I will feel repaid for all."

rebellion be minimized. European correspondents, who risked their lives to get accurate news of the disturbance, found fighting going on in all the large squares, the troops firing from the street level and the insurgents shooting with deadly effect from housetops and barricaded windows. At night the sky was reddened by the reflection of burning buildings, and the thunder of artillery could be heard for miles.

The women fought as fiercely as the men. There were hundreds of them in the crowds which wrecked the railroad along the piers. The women and children stood in front to prevent the soldiers firing while the men raised hasty fortifications in the rear, whence the troops could be fired upon. The train service to other provinces was disabled and the telegraph wires cut.

Gradually the discipline of the troops told; one district after another grew more orderly, and the rebels who did not surrender took to the hills, to carry on a desultory warfare. Then a general strike was called and the trouble seemed about to centre at Madrid. Relaxing none of its efforts in Catalonia, and prepared for the worst at the capital, the streets were strewn with sand to facilitate the charge of cavalry, and trusted troops patrolled the city; but as this issue is going to press no serious fighting has occurred there. The King has held conferences with his ministers and then walked coolly about the streets, inspiring confidence in the people.

The Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We are the largest sellers of Irrigation Bonds. And these bonds are, by far, our most popular securities with investors who know them.

Our experience with Reclamation Bonds covers 15 years. It covers the sale of many entire issues from 11 separate States. So we know the facts.

These bonds are farm liens of the most conservative class. Some are Municipal obligations. The interest rate — six per cent. — is larger than one can now obtain on any large class of equal security. The bonds are issued in serial maturities, and in denominations as low as $100.

For the information of our customers — present and prospective — we have issued a book called "The World's Greatest Industry." It is interesting, unbiased, clear and illustrated. It tells the facts about this most attractive form of investment. Please write us a postal or send us this coupon for it.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

B. J., Davenport, Ia. What is the population of Chicago, and how many nationalities are represented in that city?

The latest report gives it 2,572,835, representing some 36 different countries. There are 699,000 Americans and over 500,000 Germans, the next largest being Irish, Poles, Swedes, Russians and Bohemians, in the order named.

F. M., Leavenworth, Kan. What was the total decrease, if any, in the country's liquor bill last year?

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, there was a decrease of $79,059,743.60. Whisky production was 4,828,268 gallons less than in the preceding twelve months, and beer 2,444,183 gallons less.

H. McK., Newport, Vt. What does the German expression, "Sturm und Drang," mean?

It is translated "Storm and Pressure," and used to designate the chaotic period of German literature, from 1760 to 1800. It was then without distinctive form or order.

Troubled One. Where are the dead? I have just read a sermon which said that people lie in the grave until the resurrection, and their souls are in a state of unconsciousness until then. "The soul that sinneth shall die," "The wages of sin is death," "The dead know not anything." Eccles. 9:5; John 3:13. Also Acts 2:34, "For David is not ascended into the heavens." These and many more passages are quoted in that sermon. How are these passages reconciled with the words of our Saviour, who told the dying thief: "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise," and deathbed scenes where people see the joy of heaven, etc.?

You should not confuse the body and soul; the passages you quote refer to the former. The body of the penitent thief (as did that of David) rested in the grave, while his soul passed to Paradise, which is the same as "Abraham's bosom" (see Luke 16:22), and means a place of "safe keeping" (as in I. Pet. 3:19), and not "prison" in the modern sense of the word.

C. E. K., Tonica, Ill. In what respect do the Scriptures used by the Roman Catholics differ from those used by Protestants?

The Douai Version is the Roman Catholic Bible, translated from the Latin version of Jerome, which is commonly called the Vulgate. It differs slightly (in a few passages) from our Bible, the Authorized Version of King James, A.D. 1611.

Subscriber, Irvington, N. J. Were the States of New Jersey and Vermont ever called "slave States"?

In 1790, there were 17 slaves in Vermont and 11,423 in New Jersey. Vermont was admitted into the Union in 1791, while New Jersey was one of the original thirteen States. Massachusetts was the only one which, in 1790, had abolished slavery. Undoubtedly the others were sometimes called slave States, until slavery was abolished in them.

R. C., Staten Island, N. Y. Are there any sisterhoods in the Protestant Episcopal Church?

Yes; there are several. They were started in 1846, by Lydia Priscilla Sellon, in Devonshire, England.

L. H. K., Parker, Ind. What, if any, are the Biblical reasons for the change of the name of Saul of Tarsus to Paul?

His name, as a Jew, was Saul, and it is probable that he received the name Paul as a citizen of Rome. When the change took place or where, is not definitely known. Jerome says that he assumed the Gentile name of Paul immediately after one Sergius Paulus had been converted under his ministry; but other writers doubt this. It is likely that, on becoming a Christian, he took the name as being common among Greeks and Romans and closely resembling Saul.

C. M. W., Rockland, Mich. Is preaching the Gospel for profit apostolic? Do not all, or nearly all, Christian ministers preach for a salary? Can this be right, if healing for a fee is not apostolic?

There is no Scriptural rule or injunction against the payment of workers in the Gospel field. On the contrary, we are taught that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and that it is the duty of believers to provide for the workers' support. But there is a wide difference between reasonable support and the commercialization of Gospel work, which is too often apparent, as, for instance, where a preacher puts up his services to the highest bidder, regardless of other considerations. In apostolic times, as Paul has shown, support was due and expected (although he worked at a trade to pay his expenses while preaching), but he and the other apostles resented the suggestion of placing a money value on spiritual labor. See Peter's rebuke to Simon the sorcerer, who thought to make money, if he could only purchase the apostolic power.

Rev. H. M. Purrington, Turner, Me. In a sermon for the Fourth of July from the text, "He shall set up an ensign for the nations" (Isa. 11:12), emphasis was laid upon the fostering hand of God in establishing our national flag among the banners of the world, but that higher than the flag of any one nation is "the ensign of God." This ensign bears the cross. Already some of the nations have recognized their relation to this ensign by the blazoned cross upon some portion of their national banner. Norway, Sweden, Germany, Russia, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Portugal, Switzerland, Italy, Greece, Austria and Great Britain are examples of this honor to God's ensign. To one who desires that his country shall be in the front rank of every worthy enterprise it seems fitting that we, as a nation, should publicly show forth our witness to God by placing the cross on our national flag. In fact, it would be but a return to our early flags. The flag of the Federated Colonies bore the cross, as did that banner carried so heroically at Bunker Hill, and the first national ensign was adorned by a red cross upon the field of blue. This last is what I would suggest: To replace the cross and distribute the stars artistically, with the angles formed by the arms of the cross.

At the present time the only official cross displayed in the government service is the red cross, the emblem which means "For Christ and Humanity."

M. M. B., Craik, Saskatchewan. 1. Was the Roman Church, which held Paul a prisoner for a long time, the Roman Catholic Church? 2. Where in the Bible do we find references to the Roman Catholic Church?

1. Rome was a pagan power in the days of Paul's persecution. It became Christian later. 2. The Roman Catholic Church was not in existence until long after the time of Christ.

Reader, Idaho. Was San Francisco, Calif., in existence as a town much before the "gold fever" days of the last century?

Yes; it was founded as far back as 1776, when two friars and seventeen dragoons and their families went from Monterey and founded the Spanish Mission of San Francisco. The first Americans came in 1836.

M. E. T., Belleville, N. J. When did Dr. Talmage die?

Dr. Talmage died in 1902.

F. H., Brookfield, Mass. What were the duties of a centurion, mentioned in the account of Paul's missionary travels?

A centurion was a military officer, and his duties were equivalent to the captain of a company in a modern regiment of infantry. He commanded 100 men. This company was called a centuria.

F. B. R., Berkshire, N. Y. Are there any instances in the Bible where individuals were punished in this life for their wrongdoing?

Many of them. The record of sin and its punishment, here and hereafter, runs all through the Bible. The first great punishment is recorded in Gen. 3:24; the next Gen. 4:13; the third Gen. 6:5-7; another, Num. 14:35. In these and many other passages you will find how sins, both individual and general, are visited with punishment in the sinner's lifetime.

Little Armenian Orphans at Beirut, Helped by "The Christian Herald"

WHAT a depth of inexpressible sadness and suffering is pictured in the pathetic faces of these poor little ones, whose parents and other relatives were slain in the recent massacres in Asiatic Turkey. Surely no children in the world have had so much cause to look sorrowful as the children of unhappy Armenia. The Relief Committee at Beirut has specially appealed to "The Christian Herald" in behalf of the many widows and orphans of Kessab, a district where Moslem fanaticism did its worst work. Food, clothing, and shelter are urgently needed. All the houses in Kessab were burned. "The Christian Herald" has cabled to Mr. E. G. Freyer, Secretary and Treasurer of the Beirut Relief Committee of the American National Red Cross, through our State Department in Washington, the sum of $2,500. The disbursement of this fourth remittance is left to the discretion of the Beirut Committee.

LETTERS ON THE SUFFRAGE

In THE MAIL-BAG a few weeks ago there appeared a letter from Cora E. W., Florence, Ore., in which the writer took the ground that under present social conditions the home would be weakened rather than strengthened by giving the ballot to women. She asked:

"How much of the great temperance wave which is creeping over our land is due to the votes of women? Has it made the clean sweep claimed in the States where women have suffrage? When a woman accepts the continued company of a man addicted to the use of liquor and tobacco, without protest, and later goes to the altar with him, how can she expect to reform him by the ballot?"

A number of women readers have written to THE MAIL-BAG, commenting on Cora's letter. We give below a few of these communications:

Says Women Don't Want the Ballot

I think Cora E. W. is right; only she doesn't say half enough. That the ballot for women has been a disappointment where it has been tried many will testify. I was reading recently a letter from a lady in Wyoming, where they vote, and she wrote strongly against it. We know that all women are not intelligent or high-minded Christians, and how could we trust the ballot to such women as the suffragettes of England? They would hesitate at nothing to gain their point. Men have been trained to vote for generations, and, if they make such blunders with the ballot, what could you expect of untrained females? Why should we be compelled to vote against our will? As far as my observation goes, the majority of women do not want the ballot; the duties and responsibilities of life are heavier now than many of us know how to bear. MRS. G. H. D.

Tunkhannock, Pa.

No Sympathy for the Suffragettes

I am in perfect accord in every way with Cora E. W.'s views. Time was when I felt that if we had the ballot we might be a wonderful help in the temperance cause; but when I see how they are disgracing womanhood in London, and their attempt to do it in New York, I send up the prayer, "Lord, deliver us!" If they are forgetting their womanhood and stoop to the level of the rabble, what will they do later? They would make a sorry mess of politics. There are thousands who would honor the ballot and womanhood, and be bright and shining lights to our State and nation; but can we have the good without the bad? I fear not. L. P. R.

Says All Good Women Want to Vote

The woman suffrage movement has been an important factor in spreading the temperance reform and has given it the great success it has attained. Not only here in California, but elsewhere, the wave has made a clean sweep. This has been brought about mainly by the suffrage movement, and far from weakening the home it strengthens it. All women who are lovers of equality and justice desire the ballot; if not at present, they will see and mend their mistake later in life. When widowed and fatherless women are paying high taxes without a word of protest, it seems unjust, to say the least. My son's wife, in Idaho, votes for righteousness and temperance. As some one puts it, it takes "no more time than to buy a pound of butter." S. E. K.

Chico City, Calif.

Would Shut Out All Illiterates

You asked what the ladies thought about woman suffrage? Well, all the men of Illinois say the women shall not vote. There are many men who can neither read nor write their own names, neither do they pay a tax. Why should they be allowed to vote when there are lone women who have to pay a tax and are denied the privilege of saying where their money goes? I don't believe in giving the ballot to every one. Those women who have to pay a tax should have the privilege of voting. Voting should be on an educational basis. A man who pays no tax and can neither read nor write even his own name has no business with the ballot. N. D. G.

Lighthouse Near the Taft Cottage

The President's Summer Home

The "White House" of Beverly

OUR NEW SUMMER CAPITAL

BEVERLY, on Massachusetts' beautiful "north shore," has been added to the list of American summer capitals, and will be, now that President Taft has taken up his residence there, the centre of political interest and the Mecca of statesmen and diplomats until well into the month of September, when he returns once more to Washington.

Oyster Bay enjoyed the distinction of being the summer capital for so many years, during the two Roosevelt administrations, that people wondered to what place President Taft would go during the "hot term." Usually the President has gone to his native town or to his country place, if he had one. President Taft, however, has been going for the last sixteen years to beautiful Murray Bay, on the St. Lawrence, in the Province of Quebec, Canada. President Taft and his brother had become greatly attached to the picturesque country about the bay, and had cottages there. Of course, it was manifestly impossible for the President to make his summer capital across the border in Canada, so he early cast about for some town on the Atlantic Coast where he could have his summer home and also find facilities for carrying on the necessary office work by the numerous staff of secretaries and stenographers. A large number of places were suggested by people anxious to have their home town thus honored, but the President finally selected Beverly, which possesses in its neighborhood a picturesque stretch of seashore and inland rolling country. For healthfulness no better place could have been chosen on the coast than this.

The "North Shore," on which Beverly is situated, is dotted with beautiful country homes of Boston business men; and the well-known resorts of Manchester, Hamilton, Marblehead and the towns on Cape Ann are all connected by a network of fine roads. Just across an inlet from Beverly lies Salem. The district has long been a favorite one for the summer residences of members of the diplomatic corps, while the number of prominent Americans, from all over the United States, who spend their holiday in that favored region would make a long list. Secretary Von L. Meyer, of the Navy Department, has long been a resident of the district, and he undoubtedly made a very strong presentation of its beauty and healthfulness. Beverly is in Essex County, sixteen miles northeast of Boston, and is quite a thriving place of over sixteen thousand inhabitants. It has many manufactories, and a large number of the inhabitants are engaged in the fisheries, though the fleet of schooners which sails from here is not so large as that which puts to sea from Gloucester, a little farther up the coast. The business of the place, however, is not unduly prominent. Its streets retain the aspect which is characteristic of the older New England towns; high arching elms above the roadways, wide lawns and stately homes of Colonial type.

President Taft and Members of His Family on the Porch

The shore at Burgess Point, where the President is staying, is quite away from the town, and the only noise to disturb the quiet is the ceaseless boom of the surf along its pebbly beach. Once in a while a passing storm sends in the waves head-high. The President has tried yachting and does not care for it, leaving that pastime to his sons and daughter.

The story is told by some old salts that President Taft decided a number of years ago, while cruising off Shelter Island, that he was not cut out for a sailor. There was a sudden call to let out the main sheet. Mr. Taft sprang to do his part, the rope was paid out too rapidly as the heavy boom swung away, taking most of the skin on the inside of his hands with it. The trim little naval yacht Sylph is anchored in the harbor, but the President will probably not use it much, preferring to take his recreation in some form where he can stretch his limbs. For a large man Mr. Taft is very active, and has strong objections to being cooped up in small quarters, even for the purpose of enjoying a delightful sail along the most picturesque stretch of Atlantic coast this side of Maine.

Mrs. Taft has been at Beverly for some time, recuperating from her severe illness of last spring, and the President had been up once before to see his family settled, but was compelled by press of public business to return to Washington. On Monday, August 9, the President, having signed the tariff bill, came on from Washington. The pretty station was elaborately decorated with green, but the people of the place thought that undoubtedly their distinguished guest was tired after his long stay in Washington and they made no demonstration when he arrived. About fifty people were grouped around the platform. Mrs. Taft and her sister were there to greet him, and he was whirled away to the Stimson cottage, on the Point. A second car, in which were his secretary and several secret service men, followed. Mr. Taft, speaking to an interviewer when he arrived, said: "I am very glad to be here. All we want is a good complete rest. In view of Mrs. Taft's health, we will make as few engagements as possible."

The "White House" of Beverly is the most democratic place imaginable. The executive offices are in a brick block downtown, over a department store. The President will have as business neighbors a dentist, two tailors and a lawyer. Secretary Carpenter is in charge, and here the regular office work will be carried on as methodically as if the President and his staff were in Washington, with the exception that only matters of the greatest importance will be brought to Mr. Taft's personal attention, giving him as much time as possible to recuperate for his arduous duties of the coming year. Several foreign diplomats, however, have been received.

CHRISTIAN WHOLENESS

TEXT—John 5 : 6 (R. V.)
Jesus saith unto him, Wouldest thou be made whole?

THE scene is an out-of-doors hospital. Its name is Bethesda, the House of Mercy. It is located by the sheep-gate in Jerusalem. Its roof is the blue sky, its floors the crystal water. It has five wards, named porches. It has patients of many varieties—the sick, the blind, the halt, the withered. It has as its surgeon-in-chief the divine Jesus. I think a wave of hopefulness swept over all the inmates when they saw him. He approaches the cot of the most hopeless one among them. "If he can cure our fellow-sufferer of thirty-eight years," they say, "surely there is hope for every one of us." And indeed they are right! For wherever Jesus goes health, hope and happiness become contagious. So it is a fine day for the patients. They all seem to be on the mend now. In fact, they will soon be ready for callers, because the divine Visitor has come among them. Truly, they all enjoy better health after Jesus entered those unwalled wards of disease and despair.

The Garment of Jehovah

And it was just like the Master to single out the most hopeless patient of all. John probably witnessed the operation. At any rate, he has preserved a history of the case for the Christian Lancet, known as the New Testament. While he does not detail the symptoms of the disease, John is careful to record the words of the Surgeon. So the cure seems to crystallize itself into a study of "Christian Wholeness." We will let our thoughts gather about these centres: The Question of Life's Master, The Answer of Life's Crippled, The Command of Life's Lord.

I. The Question of Life's Master: "Wouldest thou be made whole?" Wholeness is the major note in the music of Christianity. With one hand it takes the universe in its imperial grasp, while with the other it draws the golden circle of perfection around it. The ultimate aim of the Christian religion is completion, for its genius is in the fact that it can be satisfied with nothing less. Christianity, therefore, confronts every thing and being—every man and angel, every atom and star—with the question: "Wouldest thou be made whole?" Christianity is the one religion that can ask this question and calmly wait for response. Other religions wear out while waiting for an answer. But Christianity can patiently wait, because it turns the centuries on its finger tips and folds eternity within the hollow of its hand.

Christianity asks for physical wholeness. As Christians, we cannot be too often reminded that the universe is the property of the God manifested by Christ. I say property, being a citizen of the twentieth century, but the nobler term is garment—the earth and the heavens, according to the Psalmist, being the garment or vesture of Jehovah. We are in error, I think, to say the garment is finished. No! the Infinite Weaver is momentarily toiling at his majestic loom named the universe. Spring, summer, autumn and winter tell us that he is ever slipping new designs into his loom. And as the eons come and go the shuttles fly—mountains become plains, valleys tower into lofty ranges, oceans change their beds, cities rise and fall, civilizations wax and wane, nations are born and die—but the Mighty Weaver weaves on, sleepless, tireless, exhaustless, intent on finishing his glorious garment.

God's Purpose for Humanity

Moreover, I have the conviction that no man can be on thoroughly good terms with matter, can understand its deeper significations, read its profounder suggestions, who has not glimpsed the mystery and majesty of creation as revealed in Christ. That he holds the keys that will unlock all barred doors in the universal cosmos I have not the slightest doubt. That he, in his miracles, and especially in his resurrection and ascension, exhibited a mastery over matter untold centuries in advance of the most daring dreams and generalizations of modern science, I think is unquestionable. I lately put down the most masterful volume on the philosophy of religion that has perhaps ever been published. It is a book of simply stupendous learning and research. Its author set before him the task of discovering and appraising the value of religion, no matter when and where found, in its ability to interpret man's true relation to God, to man, and to the universe. After closing this marvelous volume, I am compelled to set down my humble but deep conviction, that in the Jesus of history and the Christ of glory there is unveiled the secret of God's purpose for humanity. Here, too, is afforded the one and only key to the mysteries and splendors of creation itself. So, as never before, I can say with Paul: "In him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth; things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things hold together."

Mental Wholeness

Christianity asks for mental wholeness. The Greek ideal of the human body—and Christianity's bodily ideal is much nobler and higher—is the barest hint of the large and spacious wholeness our religion offers to man's intellectual capacity. The truth of the matter is, it is not possible for the mind of man to reach its true ripeness without invoking the Christian powers. There is nothing arbitrary in this—it is the law upon which the very constitution of the mind itself is based. As the plant requires the sun to untwist and draw out its hidden life into the beauty of a rose, so the human mind requires the Holy Spirit's tides of fructifying fulness poured into it before it can pass into the mellow splendor and full-toned richness for which it was designed. Mind you, I do not affirm that there may not be intellectual "rigor and vigor" without this. But I do say that the intellect, however vigorous, rigorous or acute, cannot attain its best and true estate without the completing energies of the Holy Spirit. Professor James uses Renan as an illustration "of the way in which breadth of knowledge may make one only a dilettante in possibilities." I thank him for the phrase. It expresses my idea precisely. No matter how ample a man's store of knowledge may be, until his brain has been smitten through and through by the light and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, he is after all "only a dilettante in possibilities." "I regard Christian," wrote the late Professor Edward Caird, "as the permanent adjective by which we must define the growing ideal of humanity." And that "permanent adjective," as I verily believe, fits no side of human nature with more thorough-going satisfaction than the intellectual side. Christ challenges the strong but imperfect brain with the question: "Wouldest thou be made whole?"

Wholeness of Spirit

Christianity asks for spiritual wholeness. I mention this supreme quality last, because it is the New Testament order. "Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; then that which is spiritual." And yet, in a profoundly true sense, the priority of the spiritual is indisputable. Because God is a Spirit, and eternally is, makes it possible for the universe and humanity to become. In all ultimate thinking, and in the fashion set by revelation, spirituality is not a fringe tacked on to the garment of life. Rather is it the very fibre which explains the warp and the woof. Jesus says, "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." Christ opens the sluice-gates of the eternal reservoirs, from whence the brimming rivers of life pour into the human consciousness. And that is why he says to us all, "Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect." Life's Master, then, has a consuming passion for spiritual perfection. He declares that the spiritual shall drink all life up into itself, even as the sun drinks up the dew, for quickening, cleansing and hallowing, that spiritualized life may be poured forth again in every refreshing shower of divine fulness and beauty.

But in demanding wholeness of the physical, mental and spiritual, let us not forget that Christ presupposes the unflagging co-operation of the human. Christ straightened out many withered folks in the days of his humiliation, but he did not turn one into a mere automaton. So he says to you and to me: "Wouldest thou be made whole?" That is to say: As an immortal spirit, are you willing to be made whole? Are you willing to go to the full length of your own ability, however meagre? Do you want health deeply enough to throw your crutches away forever? Then will you comply with the conditions of health, if I grant it?

II. The Answer of Life's Crippled: "Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool; but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me." These words bring before the mind's eye two classes of people. I am reminded, first, of those who feel that they have lost their opportunity. Perhaps they entered life under some hereditary handicap. Even before they had learned to toddle, they involuntarily joined the vast army of the crippled. They had no one, when God's angel troubled the waters of childhood, to dip them into the healing, sweetening pool of goodness. When two boys saw a crippled man, the suggestive comment of one was: "I reckon somebody stepped on him when he was little." And there are many spiritual cripples lining the shore of human life to-day who were stepped on when they were little! In this same category are those who say: "I never had the means of acquiring an education. There is an unappeased mental hunger constantly gnawing at my brain. In my growing years, when the pool of knowledge was troubled, alas! there was no man to put me in. Now, my faculties are withered, and I am the unhappy companion of the intellectually lame. Day by day I sit and watch the heaving billows roll in from the ocean of knowledge, but they leave with me no mental treasure." To this same category, also, belong those who bemoan the fact that they were not lifted out of their cradles and plunged into the golden sea of wealth. "Sir," they say, "I have no man, when the financial waters are troubled, casting up their gilt-edged stocks and bonds, to put me into the pool."

A Word to the Crippled

Now, to these three classes—the hereditarily, the educationally, the financially crippled—let me say just a word: You have no monopoly, my friend, upon the handicap named heredity. "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God"—that is the plain statement of a universal fact. But the glory of God is more than sufficient for the sin and shortness of all—that is the comfortable message of the Gospel. It is the Gospel of the first century, and it is also the conclusion of the twentieth. For according to one of our most competent scholars, the uniform deliverance of all religions consists of two parts: First, an uneasiness; and, second, its solution. "The uneasiness, reduced to its simplest terms, is a sense that there is something wrong about us as we naturally stand. The solution is a sense that we are saved from the wrongness by making proper connection with the higher powers."

Moreover, if you have been deprived of the blessing of what is technically termed an education, then, I beseech you, redouble your energies in gathering up the rubies of wisdom. For the vast majority it is still true that "knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers." If, then, you have been deprived of an education, by faithful obedience to the laws of God and your own soul you may yet climb the radiant heights of wisdom, and enjoy the peace that passeth knowledge. This is indeed that wisdom without which knowledge, mere education, but reveals the thinness of its own inner substance.

The Responsibility of Wealth

As to harboring regrets over the lack of wealth, most people, I think, should be congratulated that they do not possess it. To master money rather than be mastered by it, to make wealth a servant rather than become its slave, is, according to the verdict of human experience, a tremendously difficult task, and one all too rarely achieved in our own time. We cannot overlook the fact that those who have been entrusted with wealth have likewise been entrusted with great responsibility. The riddle of the rich man, the camel and the needle's eye, still has before it the words: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God?" These words were spoken by One who knew not the pettiness of class hatred, but who knew the infinite worth of souls. Jeremiah embodies the true ideal for all: "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man

STRANGE TORTURES IN LIBERIA

FROM a letter from a white missionary at Palmas, Liberia, Walter B. Williams, superintendent of Grand Cess Mission, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some idea may be gathered of the difficulties and dangers that beset the native Christian converts in that benighted country.

Mr. Williams writes that that section of Liberia is in great need of evangelists. He says: "We need ten evangelists here who could, under God's leading, in a few years of faithful preaching, bring in some five thousand or ten thousand souls. Funds must be had to carry on this work of divine grace. I have baptized 120 persons, and we have had 30 conversions during the past week. We have 200 and more out each Lord's Day at 5 A.M. for prayer, 700 to class meeting and 1,200 for preaching. We have a crowded Sunday School. Our little church only accommodates 200 or 300 persons, and as we have 1,200 we are compelled to hold our meetings in the open air; and, as this is our rainy season, we are greatly hindered in the work.

"An old heathen king here brought me $4 as a contribution to the work. Some of our Christians have been dreadfully abused. They have been hung up by the hands over slow-smoking fires, and forced to breathe burning pepper. Red pepper has been rubbed into their eyes. They have been whipped, and their houses torn down and their families driven away. Their young women's hair has been shaved, which here in Grand Cess means a dreadful disgrace. Yet they have been faithful unto death.

"This is a marvelous field, white unto the harvest. I ask the prayers of your readers that God's mighty Spirit may be poured out here. The people all along the line are begging us to send teachers and preachers."

From another missionary (Mr. J. A. Robertson, of the Sinoe River Industrial Mission, Jacktown, Liberia) we have a more cheerful picture. The people are eager for education. The little band of missionaries is working hard and faithfully. Habits of industry are being cultivated, the work being chiefly farm work—raising cocoa, sweet potatoes, eddoes, cassava, plantain, bananas, corn and rice. The tribes in the interior are begging for missionaries.

As an illustration of the fact that heathen rites and observances still prevail in Liberia, the photograph on this page (received from Anna E. Hall, of the Garraway Mission) is timely and pertinent. It shows a gathering of natives to do honor, according to the ancient native usage, to Subbah, a dead chief. In grotesque costumes, which are in strange contrast with the silent figure lying on the rude bier, the men and women are about to begin the funeral dance. This function, in which the solemn and the ludicrous are so oddly mingled, will be kept up for hours until the dancers drop from sheer exhaustion. It is one of the old heathen observances, which the missionaries in Liberia find hard to overcome.

Funeral Dance Around the Body of a Dead Liberian Chief

The industrial and political future of Liberia is a matter of much conjecture at the present time. More than one of the European Powers would be glad to annex the little republic; but as it is our foster-child, this scheme of benevolent assimilation will hardly be attempted. The chief towns are Robertsport, Monrovia (capital), Marshall, Edina, Great Bassa (Upper Buchanan), Greénville, and Harper. The capital has a population of 5,000; while the population of the country is estimated at 2,000,000 natives (Krumen being the most important), pagans and Mohammedans, and some 60,000 civilized negroes, who are Episcopalians and Presbyterians, etc. English is the official language, and British weights and measures and money are largely used. The president, vice-president, and a council of six form the executive, while legislation is in the hands of the House of Representatives and the Senate. Liberia was suggested in 1816 as a home for freed American negroes, but it was not till 1822 that an actual settlement was made. In 1847 the colony was recognized by the Powers as an independent republic. Intertribal wars have been frequent, but the declaration of peace, signed in 1904 by the most powerful chiefs, may lead to their cessation.

Miss Hall, writing from Harper, Cape Palmas, says that funds for scholarships in the mission school are greatly needed. Many native children could be taken in from heathenism, and trained and educated as Christians, if the means were supplied. These, in turn, could go out as workers among their own people—as faithful evangelists, to carry the Gospel message to those who still sit in darkness. This is the great hope of the Christian missionaries in Liberia, that native converts will play an important part in Africa's evangelization.

CHRISTIAN WHOLENESS

Sermon by Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, D.D.

glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth, and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."

But this unfortunate man stands, I think, for a second class of persons. I refer to the quiet, unaggressive, unobtrusive souls, who are always content to hide themselves in the background. Robert Louis Stevenson's "Aunt June" is their patron saint. Many and many a time the prizes of life seemed to be within their grasp. If they had been a little more ambitious, a little more selfish, perhaps, the treasure might have been theirs. But no! just then a longer, a more acquisitive hand shot forth and grasped the prize. And in none but the noblest sense the attitude of their lives is expressed in the words: "But while I am coming, another steppeth down before me."

Well, I believe that these unselfish souls do not ask or need our sympathy. Have you paused to consider that they have satisfactions that coarser natures know nothing about? Not long ago I climbed to the summit of a "heaven-kissing hill." The journey up was wearisome enough. But the top of the hill was worth all the toil it took to reach it. For we then had not only a splendid view of the surrounding country, but our cheeks were fanned by breezes freighted with the perfume of the honeysuckle. Such breezes cannot be described. They are like religion in this: they must be experienced in order to be appreciated. And as there are honeysuckled hills in the gardens of nature, so there are honeysuckled souls in the country of the Spirit. Living suppressed lives, they also perfume the spiritual winds that cleanse and bless with their sacrificial sweetness. They are minstrels of the Eternal Goodness. They are gleams out of the face of God. They are the alabaster souls—they are ever being broken, and they are ever shedding forth their divine odor.

III. The Command of Life's Lord: "Jesus saith unto him, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk." Ascent—Mastery—Progress: these are the terms of our Lord's command.

"Arise!" It seems to ring out of the unseen sanctuaries of the spiritual and eternal. It has the wealth of health in its tones. In Christ, ascent may be glimpsed from the nethermost descent. His power somehow gets in beneath the cellars of being, and there is the instantaneous thrill of a mighty upheaval. "Arise!" smites the soul sleeping the sleep of death. At first there may be only the feeble response of a mere blink. But it comes again and again: "Arise, arise! I say unto thee, Arise!" Now the blink has gone, and there is a wide open gaze toward the invisible. "Arise, arise, arise!" Ah! new worlds of light are breaking, new aspirations are created, new hopes are kindled, new loves are born! The personal centres of being are shifted. They are moved out of darkness into light, out of the carnal into the spiritual. Great hates are fostered—hates for old, unspiritual loves. Great loves are engendered—loves for the new, true things of God and the soul. Auerbach wrote in his last letter: "Always think of me as striving blithely upward." And it is just this upward striving of the soul that begins, in obedience to the desire for wholeness, when Christ commands the life of ascent.

Then, also, the awakened desire to climb is followed by a consciousness of God-given mastery: "Take up thy bed." Take up the very thing upon which you lay prone, crippled, helpless, and throw it across your shoulder. Make that evil habit, which has so often tripped you, to be your willing slave. Henceforth carry the bed that has carried you. Master the thing that has been your master. You were not intended to be a spiritual lounger, but a spiritual ascender, a spiritual master! Is it not something like this that sounds in the life in which the great things, the imperial joys, the other-world powers, have found hospitality? The other morning there floated up from the street, through my study window, the quick, shrill blasts of a boy's whistle. Never before had this whistle given satisfaction to its blower. From the time I bought it and gave it to the lad it seemed to be clogged up. Of course it could not, in that condition, make much noise—and noiseless things are always away below par in the estimation of a healthy boy. But, as I say, on this particular morning there was plenty of ear-splitting sound. Moreover, I found the boy was going from house to house with the postman, blowing his whistle. When I asked what had happened to the toy, I received this answer: "I got my whistle cleaned out this morning." "By whom?" "Why, the postman—he did it!" Ah! there is a world of suggestiveness in that cleaned-out whistle! That golden morning was filled with oceans of pure atmosphere, but none of it could pass through a stopped-up whistle. And there are heavenly winds lingering about that mystic flute named the soul. They are saying, as Mendelssohn says a mountain or a river used to say unto him, "Turn me into music, play me on the organ." But so long as the impure atmospheres have the right of way, the soul's true symphonies must remain forever unplayed. "If the light that is within thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!" If the melody that is within thee be discord, how great is that discord!"

Finally, the command of life's Lord is progressive: "Walk!" "I have told you, O withered soul, to rise up: I have told you to be a master; now I tell you to ascend unto increasing mastery forever and ever. I here and now open before you vistas of endless progress. You need not be overwhelmed by the thought. Though you learn never so slowly, remember you are going to learn forever. Be not oppressed by the march of cycles. I am King of the ages. They can bring nothing to you that I have not already brought to them. And I have loaded them with goodness, wisdom and life, to leave with you in increasing abundance. You are now within the sphere of the infinite. You do not walk toward Me, O soul, but within Me. I am the Alpha and the Omega—the first and the last—the bright, the Morning Star!"

In some such way I seem to hear the voice of my Lord speaking to all crippled souls. He leads the human spirit in behind the vision of things. He is the architect and builder of Christian wholeness. I am glad that, with his incarnation, the power of a new order of mind was projected into the sphere of our humanity. I am glad that he makes us dream of the day when we shall be like him. I am glad, also, that in this very dreaming it is a law of God and the soul that we are becoming like him. For Christ is to me the picture of a perfected universe. That is to say, Christ's manifested perfection as God and man is a prophecy of what the universe of matter and of souls shall be, when God is all in all.

CONFERENCE DAYS AT NORTHFIELD

By ABBY G. BAKER

"THAT which has filled me with the greatest surprise, and I need not add the greatest happiness, on returning to the homeland," said a missionary at the Women's Missionary Conference at Northfield, "is the marvelous growth of interest in missions since I left the United States ten years ago. I find it everywhere: in our churches, among the young people, in the women's societies, and, most of all, here at Northfield."

As one looked at that immense auditorium, filled with earnest men and women, all intent upon the study of the Word of God and the best methods of carrying on the work of his kingdom, the truth of the missionary's statement could be realized.

Hardly thirty years ago Dwight L. Moody began a little class for Bible study in his library at Northfield. It had attained a wonderful growth before he passed on to "the glory-land," yet it was but the beginning. To-day, the School for Girls at East Northfield, with its finely-equipped, substantial brick buildings, has a registration of several hundred pupils; and the Young Men's School over at Mount Hermon, with its many buildings, splendid farm and sessions lasting the entire year, has a waiting list of over one hundred applicants for entrance at the coming fall term. These are the results of the two small schools Mr. Moody started during the eighties. The Bible and Mission Conferences have also grown remarkably. From the second Young Men's Conference, which he called together at Mount Hermon, grew the student volunteer movement, and only eternity will reveal the number of missionaries who have determined upon their life service here at Northfield, or the vastly greater number who have been led to a higher standard of Christian living through the influence of this hallowed place.

Many well-known speakers are at the conferences this summer, and the attendance has been most encouraging. At the Students' Conference for young men (July 2-11 inclusive) all of the leading colleges were represented. There were daily Bible classes, missionary institutes, delegation meetings and song services, while each day closed with a sunset service on Round Top and an inspiring evening address in the Auditorium. Such ministerial lights and Bible teachers as Dr. Henry Coffin, Dean Bosworth, Rev. J. T. Stone, Dr. Kelman and Rev. John D. Adam conducted the Bible services, while Dr. Zwemer, of Arabia; Dr. Grenfell, of Labrador; Prof. Henry B. Wright and Prof. Beach thrilled their audiences with the story of the work on mission fields.

The Young Women's Conference was held simultaneously with the Women's Home Mission Conference (July 13-20). Each morning at nine o'clock Miss Margaret Slattery conducted a series of studies of Bible characters. At a quarter past ten each morning Dr. John Strong led a class in the study of the life of Christ; Miss Lucy Chaplin led another in the life of Paul; Dr. Angie M. Myers conducted a class on foreign missions, and Mrs. Fred S. Bennett, president of the Woman's Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, led another class in the study of the new Home Mission Textbook. At 11:30 A.M. and in the evening there were addresses in the Auditorium by such noted spiritual leaders as Dr. J. H. Jowett, Dr. Stone, Rev. Charles Studd, Dr. Kelman and Dr. Jefferson.

A Field Day at the Young Women's Conference

The attendance was the largest the Young Women's Conference has ever had. There were delegations from Dobb's Ferry, Wellesley, Smith, Bryn Mawr, Radcliffe and other colleges, and from Rochester came a car filled with young women "whose earnest Christian influence is felt all over the city," a prominent Rochester man said to Mr. W. R. Moody.

The afternoons are given to rest and recreation during the young people's and the women's conferences. Northfield never saw a prettier sight than when the girls formed in college groups and wound in and out on the green hillside, in an endless "daisy chain," unless perhaps one should except the picture they made in their pretty light summer gowns when they met at sunset on Round Top. Then, with the amber-and-gold rays of the setting sun glinting down through the pines on the bright young faces, lighted with high purpose, while from their lips fell the words of song or prayer, one could not but be deeply impressed with the beauty and the significance of the scene.

The Women's Home Mission Conference represents a council from six Home Mission Boards—that of the Baptist, Christian, Congregational, Evangelical Lutheran, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian and the Reformed Church of America. It was not organized until three years after the Woman's Foreign Mission Council, and this year's conference was therefore the third which had been held by the women of the home boards.

The headquarters of the committee were at Marquand Hall, and there and at Music Hall the majority of the delegates were entertained. The exposition of the home mission study book, From Darkness to Light, was given by Mrs. Bennett in Music Hall, and was one of the most attractive features of the conference. The book is a hard one to teach to a large body of women coming from different sections, some no doubt with preconceived notions and race prejudice, but Mrs. Bennett handled it in a very clever manner. The book, dealing exclusively with the colored people, was written by a Southern woman, Miss Mary Helm, from a sympathetic yet just point of view, and Mrs. Bennett interpreted it in the same spirit.

Each morning at nine o'clock a devotional service and suggestive Bible reading was given. These were designed to prove helpful in women's mission circles. At 9:30 there was another illustration exercise. One morning Mrs. E. D. Page, of Brooklyn, gave an exhibition of home mission handicraft; next morning there was a "living illustration of a woman's home mission meeting," and still another morning a blackboard illustration of methods. At some of the meetings missionaries told of their work in home fields, the speakers including Miss Isabelle Crawford, Rev. Frank Wright, Mrs. A. D. Elder and Rev. J. W. Stevenson. Dr. Jowett of England, Rev. John Kelman of Scotland, and Dr. Thompson, chairman of the Home Mission Councils, made telling addresses in the Auditorium.

The Woman's Foreign Mission Conference held its sixth annual session July 22 to 29. At the same time the summer school of Sunday School Methods was in session, and a number of the meetings were held conjointly. The opening service was on Thursday evening, when Miss Stanwood, president of the council, presided, and Mrs. Frances E. Clark, the joint author with her husband of the Foreign Missions Textbook for this year, The Gospel in Latin Lands, made the address of the evening. Mrs. Montgomery gave the lesson from this book each morning.

On Monday afternoon occurred the denominational rallies, and each evening enthusiastic mass-meetings were held in the Auditorium. Many special prayer meetings were held, to pray for laborers for the foreign fields, and fully twenty volunteers were reported during the conference. The question is constantly asked by the women who attend, "Why are there two women's conferences of missions?" There is no doubt that the two conferences could be combined to advantage, as is done at Winona. It would be a great saving of time, strength and money.

The Sunday School Conference, like the others, had a large attendance, and Mrs. Conant, Miss Wilena Brown, Mrs. M. S. Lamereaux, Miss Nannie Fraser, Mr. Eugene Foster, Mr. Marshall A. Hudson and other equally as well known Sunday School workers had charge of the various sections. The General Conference began Saturday evening, July 31, with an inspiring address by Rev. J. H. Jowett. Among the speakers announced are Rev. G. A. Johnston-Ross, Cambridge, England; Rev. J. Stuart Holden, London; Rev. John A. Hutton, Glasgow; Canon Cody, Toronto; Dr. A. T. Pierson, Dr. Gunsaulus, and many others.

The Sage Chapel at Northfield

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—REV. E. PAYSON HAMMOND, "the Child Evangelist," is holding meetings in Hartford, Conn.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., last season had their most successful experience in revival work. There were eight thousand seekers at their meetings. They begin work in Oklahoma City, Okla., soon.

—THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, Cambridge, Mass. (Rev. Dr. J. L. Campbell, pastor), has been passing through the most remarkable revival in its history. In eight months the church has received over 220 new members, and the interest continues.

—THE FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the first religious service ever held at Ocean Grove, N. J., was celebrated on July 31. That pioneer service was held in a tent then occupied by the family of the late Rev. Joseph H. Thornley, of Philadelphia, Pa., on land now designated as Founders' Park. Thirty Methodists attended it. The only survivor of that band is the Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard, president of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association.

—TWO WEEKS AGO a young Armenian student of Tarsus College came to New York from Adana, the scene of the late massacre, in which twenty of his relatives perished. His father and two brothers were killed in the great massacres of 1895. The son was taken to the mission orphanage at Marash, where he was educated. He is a young man of promise, speaking English fairly well. His story of the terrible scenes in Adana, of which he was an eye-witness, is a realistic and moving one. Churches, Sunday Schools and Young People's meetings desiring to engage him to speak before them on the massacres should address Mr. H. Hovagimian, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

—SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, has been swept by a revival, under the American evangelists, Chapman and Alexander. One of the most remarkable meetings was that for the streetcar men. One hundred men confessed Christ. Among the converts of the mission were a fortune-teller, a prize-fighter and an Australian aborigine.

—AT THE summer conferences to be held at Montreat, N. C., Rev. Wilbert W. White, president of the Bible Teachers' Training School, New York City, takes charge of the season's programme. Other speakers and teachers to assist in the conferences are Dr. Josiah Strong, Rev. Charles Stetzle, Governor R. B. Glenn, Dr. James I. Vance, W. C. Pearce, Franklin McElfresh, Bishop Atkins, Governor Hoke Smith, J. Campbell White, Dr. C. R. Hemphill, and others. Dr. White conducts the conference and gives a helpful course of study in the English Bible.

—THE WINONA BIBLE CONFERENCE continues from August 22 until August 31. The auditorium has been enlarged so that there is seating capacity for an additional 1,500. Besides several famous foreign teachers, the greatest American teachers will also be present, including Dr. Frank Gunsaulus, Rev. George Stuart, Dr. Francis McConnell, Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Dr. W. G. Moorhead, Dr. Frank N. Palmer, Dr. J. M. Gray, and many others. Melville E. Trotter will have charge of the mission workers' conference.

An Open-Air Meeting-Place

A STRIKE TIES UP A WHOLE NATION

ONE of the most remarkable strikes in industrial history for the last few weeks has tied up a large part of the business of Sweden, and placed the people of Stockholm practically in a state of siege. In fact, the citizens of the capital have suffered nearly as much inconvenience as if an enemy from a foreign shore had encamped without their walls and was waiting to starve them into surrender, for they have been unable to secure the ordinary necessaries of life from the country on account of the suspension of traffic. All trades and occupations have been affected. So far has the strike fever spread that even the grave-diggers have refused to perform their customary duties. To put the whole state of affairs briefly, it has been made uncomfortable to live; yet those who "shuffle off this mortal coil" must wait until after the strike is over before they may be decently buried.

The way in which the strike spread was a surprise to the government, the employers of labor, and even, it may be said, to the strikers themselves, who had hardly hoped for such a universal tie-up of business.

For some time there has been much friction in the cotton and woolen mills. There was a long dispute over the wage rate, threats of strikes on the part of the workers, and warning of a suspension of production on the part of the mill owners. At last, thirteen thousand men in these industries were locked out. At once workmen in other trades began to start sympathetic strikes, in order to complicate the entire industrial situation in Sweden and force the government, or members of the employers' association, to bring pressure on the owners of the woolen and cotton mills so that they would agree to the terms of their locked-out employees.

The employers' association, on August 2, ordered a lockout of the hands of the iron foundries, to the number of thirty thousand. This made a total of eighty thousand locked out from the various industries. The number of men who went on strike in all lines of work far exceeded those who were compelled to stop on account of the owners shutting down their works. The Federation of Trades Unions called for a general strike, with most startling results. Wednesday, August 4, was the date set for the opening of this labor war, and the situation was so threatening that the government took all possible military precautions to preserve order, while at the same time it endeavored to get the employers and men to arrange their difficulties amicably. The Young Socialist party, a militant political organization, attempted to develop the strike to the point where a revolution could be the only possible result, so, as a matter of self-defense, the government warned political malcontents that all disorders "would be nipped in the bud." On the first sign of disorder the authorities were to declare the city in a state of siege. Soldiers were marched in from the surrounding districts and placed at strategic points, and the Swedish army in all parts of the country prepared for any emergency which might arise. There are a large number of bridges about Stockholm, which connect the capital with the numerous adjacent islands, and strong guards were posted on their approaches.

Squads of dragoons every little while went cantering down the streets, while dispatch-bearers hastened from one point of assembly to another. The staid old citizens of Stockholm shook their heads gloomily, and then went home and barricaded the doors and observed events from the upper story windows.

The very air itself seemed charged with a feeling of coming trouble. Sweden ordinarily is a peaceful country, and the declaration of a general strike threw the inhabitants into a state of panic. The day before the order to stop work by the strike leaders, the ferries stopped running, and no milk or provisions were brought in from the country. The boats were docked and fixed for the coming winter. Usually they do not stop running until late in October, so the public will be much inconvenienced for over two months to come. The men who worked for the city threw down their tools and went home, and the telegraph linemen, who in Sweden are employed by the State, refused to perform their duties. The government, fearing that the water works and electric light plants would also be forced to suspend operations, ordered the soldiers to go to work in them. A civil guard was organized to protect property, and its sentries were posted in front of the banks and in front of stores which might be attractive to looters.

King Gustav, the beloved of all classes of his people, was greatly concerned over the serious aspect affairs have taken, not on his own account, for he is a monarch who always thinks of his country first, but on account of the general distress which would result if matters remained in the almost intolerable state they had assumed. He promptly summoned the members of Parliament to Stockholm, to attend a special session of the national Rigsdag, for the purpose, if possible, of settling the difficulty.

The day the general strike began the streetcars did not run and the cabmen refused to take out their horses, and the citizens of Stockholm who had business at a distance from their homes had to walk. The stores were, for the most part, closed, but the streets were filled with thousands of strikers and workmen, who walked about, evidently pleased with the condition in which they found the business of the city. Volunteers from the citizens took up the ordinary work of the municipality, even cleaning the streets, and sticking doggedly at it despite the jeers of the strikers, who gathered on the corners to see them sweep.

The bakers cooled off their ovens, to join the men in the street, and one union after another called out its men until work was carried on in a few places only. Although the strikers were quiet enough at first, great fear was expressed that riot and pillage would follow when the food supply ran low. The gun shops were practically besieged by people who wanted weapons to protect their homes, and in a few hours the available stock of firearms was exhausted. A gunboat was stationed near the gas works, and no boats were allowed to pass along the shore near them. A large quantity of dynamite was discovered to be missing from the government stores, and it was surmised that the strikers would use it to blow up the light plants and plunge the city into utter darkness.

For a short time the dead in the city were left unburied, after the grave-diggers had struck. Then the people in the poor-houses were ordered out to take their places. The undertakers also had gone on strike, so that the dead were conveyed to their last resting place on stretchers, the funeral processions all being surrounded by armed escorts from the regular army.

After the strike had been on several days the hotels and restaurants raised the charges for food to famine prices. This did not affect the tourists, however, for they had all fled the city. The loss to the merchants on account of the departure of travelers during the height of the season will be no small sum. Sweden has been increasing in popularity as a place to visit in the warm weather, and Americans, and people from all over Europe, have been including this picturesque country in their summer trips. Probably few will be back until next year.

The strikers lived mostly on fish. Many thousands of the men camped out along the shores of the numerous islands about Stockholm and spent their time angling. A large number of the better class of work people had laid in a stock of provisions in anticipation of trouble, and took the time for a protracted holiday.

King Gustav read a message, which he had carefully prepared, which met with the hearty approval of the cabinet. It was a message to be sent to both employers and strikers, urging them, from patriotic motives, to come to an agreement without delay. The king urged them to submit their points at issue to arbitration. He then called to the palace Senator Lindquist, president of the Federation of Trades Unions, and Director Von Sydow, who is head of the employers' association. Both came, but the conference was without practical result. The next day more men were ordered out, and the strikers became more aggressive.

Outside of Stockholm the strike was not universal, but most of the large towns were affected. At Gothenburg ten thousand men were on strike, and the troops loaded the ships. This is the state of affairs at the present writing. Before this strikes the eye of the reader conditions may have become far worse. It is to be hoped, however, that an amicable settlement will be speedily reached.

HOW PROHIBITION WORKS IN THE SOUTH

—AMONG THE FAVORITE tactics of the anti-prohibitionists, South and West, has been a trick of publishing statements affecting to prove that business and labor are demoralized in prohibition districts, and that drinking goes on there as widely as before, but secretly. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on a previous occasion, exposed this method of misrepresentation. Now, Governor Kitchin of North Carolina, in a published letter, takes up the cudgel for truth and fair-play. He says: "There is not a county in the State spending as much money for, or consuming as much, whisky as before prohibition. Business in the State is as sound and progressive as in any adjoining State. Prohibition has not demoralized labor. The law is supported by public sentiment, and is a great benefit to the State."

The "Quickened Public Conscience"

THAT eminent Italian historian, Professor Ferrero, who recently visited this country, has been telling the people of Paris his impressions of what he calls "the anti-plutocratic movement" here, which he describes as a struggle between the old traditions of American democracy and gold, luxury and pleasure. He pictures the United States as in the initial throes of a struggle resembling that which Rome underwent and which led to its permanent decline. Our quick development, our great changes, social and industrial, and the consequent creation of a multitude of new needs, real or imaginary, he declares, combine to use up the earnings of our working classes rapidly. Not having acquired the saving habit, they are thus kept continually poor. He concludes that our system of industrialism is undermining the old order of things and destroying "the America of Franklin and Washington." What the outcome will be he hesitates to predict.

It is well to be reminded occasionally of our national shortcomings, and we should take such a reminder kindly from so distinguished a source. It is true that the growth of great fortunes, the increasing love of luxury and pleasure, and the new industrial conditions are claiming more and more the attention of thoughtful Americans. But there are counter influences at work which operate as a check on these and similar dangers. What has been called the "quickened public conscience" is here, more than in any other land on earth, a power sufficient to check all abuses of authority—municipal, State or national. That power, once awakened, has swept corruptionists before it like chaff in the wind; it has redeemed cities and States from the grasp of lawless officials and bribe-taking Legislatures; it has dragged down the most influential political criminals and stripped them of power and wealth, and driven them into exile; and more recently it has shown its purpose of checking industrial and capitalistic abuses, wherever they exist. Wherever we have bad government or public abuses in a State or community, it is our own fault. We have always at command the means of rectification.

We have the most implicit faith in the sound good sense and love of justice that are the foundations of American character. With the advance of education and enlightenment on all public questions, our people are awakening to a higher realization of their own power. It is this power, set in motion by a quickened public conscience and operating through the legitimate and ever-open channels of agitation, legislation and the ballot-box, which is the safeguard of the nation.

Hearing the Other Side

IN another part of this issue, we print a number of letters from men and women interested in Chinese missions and Sunday Schools, several of whom come to the defense of the system of teaching Chinese which is known as the "single student system." While we respect the arguments of these friends, every one of whom speaks from personal experience and is therefore entitled to a fair hearing, we nevertheless submit that the system, even by the showing made in these letters, stands condemned. There is nothing in the situation to reflect, even in the slightest degree, on the character of the Chinese Sunday School work or its conductors; it is only a question of a change in methods, which the majority of those who have joined in this discussion seem to regard as advisable, and which, moreover, is demanded by general public sentiment. There is no more reason why Chinese should be taught by the single scholar method than Syrians, Armenians, Hindus, or other Orientals who come to this country, and are brought under Christian influences. "It is wise," says one of these correspondents, "to avoid even the appearance of evil."

We have a deep feeling of sympathy with and a cordial approval of the work of these godly men and women, who have given up the larger part of their lives for the evangelization of the Chinese in America. It is a noble, self-sacrificing work; a labor performed for His sake, and for the love of souls, and we should be the last to put an obstacle in the way of its successful performance. Throughout this whole discussion, there has been no thought or suggestion of abandoning Chinese mission and Sunday School effort; it is simply, we repeat, a question of a change of methods, conforming them to the needs and spirit of the times, and we believe that, in view of the public feeling on the subject, such a change would everywhere meet with hearty approval and would soon result in bringing new strength and support to the work of Chinese evangelization.

Keeping God Waiting

MY transgressions are mine more than anything else is mine, except my own soul. My clothes and books are mine, but I can give them away or sell them, and they are mine no more. My money is mine, but a thief may make it his to-night. My hands and feet are mine, but an accident may cut them off, and then they belong to the worms. My body is mine, but death may lay it in the dust, and I, the immortal self, shall live apart.

But my sins are mine more than my body is mine. Not all the changes of time, not death itself, not all created powers can cut asunder, can even touch, the strange tie that binds my sins to myself. But, thanks to God, my sins are not myself. They may be taken from me. The hand of Almighty Love can untie the bands that bind this burden to my soul. He will, if I ask him. And so quickly will he do it! "I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord." Pardon and deliverance from the burden came between the confession of the heart and the confession of the lips. The Lord did not keep him waiting—he had kept the Lord waiting. The prodigal son did not have to wait long, though the poor father had been kept waiting many days.

What a "Dreadnought" Costs

BISHOP MALLALIEU has given a very practical turn to the "Dreadnought" discussion, which is still going on in two continents. In a recent article in the Michigan Christian Advocate, he makes these interesting observations, which are calculated to set sensible people thinking:

> It costs about $1,500 every time a twelve-inch gun is fired. This, of course, includes the wear and tear of the gun. But $1,500 would build a neat cottage for a laboring man. It would support two first-rate female teachers. It would support a minister of the Gospel of peace in heathen lands for a whole year. Then it costs $10,000,000 of good money to build one of those horrible Dreadnoughts; and $1,000,000 per annum to keep one of them afloat, and in ten years or less the ship that costs all this goes to the junk-heap. But what could be wrought with the $20,000,000 thus spent on one engine of war in the brief space of ten years? A thousand churches could be built, each costing $20,000; or two thousand school houses could be built, each costing $10,000; or twenty thousand school teachers, good men and college graduates, could be employed at a salary of $1,000; or five thousand farms could be bought, paying $4,000 for each one of them; or forty thousand young men or women could be kept in college for a whole year, allowing each one of them $500. . . . More than 14,000,000 have lost their lives in the wars of the nineteenth century, and, sad to say, most of these have been slain within the bounds of Christendom.

Seldom has any one penned a more striking argument against the folly of naval and military rivalry carried to the extent of national oppression and impoverishment. Let us hope the day may soon come when all international disputes will be settled by the just and economical method of peaceful arbitration.

Chicago's Woman Educator

CHICAGO is in the thrill of a new experience. For the first time in the history of any large American city, a woman has been chosen as superintendent of schools. Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, the lady who has been thus honored in Chicago, is described as having grown up with the public school system of that city for the last forty-seven years, having begun service as a teacher in 1862. She was not satisfied, however, to remain as a teacher, but studied, kept her eyes and ears open to the developments around her, and waited her opportunity. The result was that, when the opportunity did come, she was thoroughly equipped and ready. There is not a single feature, not a minute detail of school administration, with which Mrs. Young is not familiar. She means to be the real head of her department and not a figurehead. She is a warm advocate of industrial education, does not believe in an overloaded curriculum, and lays considerable stress on the old-fashioned three R's. Incidentally, we may mention that she is the highest paid woman educator in the country, receiving $10,000 a year salary.

"Like Oil Upon the Stormy Waters"

THE following letter from Rev. W. H. Stephens, treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Famine Fund, sets forth conditions of such unusual interest that we give it for the benefit of our readers generally:

"Dear Dr. Klopsch: We have much pleasure in acknowledging receipt of $3,390 for orphans supported through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclosed in your letter of May 14.

"We were greatly pleased to hear of your reception by the King of Italy, and to know that he has heard of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work in India.

"In my conversation with the leading officials of the land I have spoken of the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and while all know much of what you have done few realize the extent of it. It is always a great pleasure to mention this work to influential natives. This kind of thing greatly surprises them. It is not easy for the Hindu to comprehend the motives that move a people, ten thousand miles away, to send vast sums here for starving people in whom they have no political interest. In these days of unrest and distrust of the white man, an interest of this kind pours more oil on the stormy waters than you could imagine. I sincerely believe that the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for India has greatly contributed to lessen the dislike and distrust of the Hindu for the foreigner, of which you are hearing so much in these days. I am writing this in Poona. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Office is in Poona, and Poona figures more prominently in all that stands for sedition than any other place in India, excepting Calcutta.

"Down at the other end of this city, I know that there exists no end of political intrigue and red-hot sedition. At this end is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Office, passing on its thousands of dollars for suffering India, and, down at the other end, bomb-makers are busy trying to upset the white man's government. Who would say that we are not doing something to neutralize that work?

"I have never had a discouraged feeling about this work of evangelizing India. I know that this distracted, caste-cursed land needs a rallying point. It needs some unifying idea that will make India one people. It needs some banner, under which it may gather, and under which it may march out into a nobler national life. I know, and am sure, that that idea they will find nowhere but at the Cross of Jesus. I am sure that the only banner under which they can march toward national greatness, or any other kind of greatness, is the banner of Jesus.

"Poona, India. W. H. STEPHENS."

Airship for South Pole

HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR, the successful explorer, is preparing to make a dash for the South Pole. His singular successes in his explorations in eastern, southern and central Asia, Africa and the East Indies, can be attributed to his ability, energy and careful preparation. His plan is to make a dash for the Pole in the warm season, beginning in the spring and leaving before the snows of winter cover the Antarctic regions. The whole trip, after entering the ice-fields, he expects to cover in seven months.

Henry Savage Landor

"Although most people associate my explorations with tropical countries, on account of my recently published books on Central Africa and the East Indies," said Mr. Landor, "I have really had a great deal of experience under circumstances and conditions climatically parallel to those that one must encounter in polar regions, having spent a considerable time exploring and charting the glacier fields of the Himalayas. When I was in this region I not only had to put up with a polar climate, but with a very rare atmosphere, which greatly increased my difficulties. I therefore consider that I am not without experience as an explorer of icy places."

Although Mr. Landor has not made the news public, there is a persistent rumor in the capitals of Europe that he intends to use an airship for the last part of his journey; and that the one he intends to employ is a new one, which he has in course of construction and on which he has secured a patent. The construction of this machine is a secret; the only feature known to outsiders is that Mr. Landor drives his flying-machine with double articulated propellers, running in inverse directions. It is stated that considerable American, as well as English, money has been offered to promote the plans of this explorer.

Mr. Landor in His Workshop

Men are learning new ideas so rapidly, and are putting them into practical expression so completely, that it will not be long until every portion of the earth, including the Poles, will have been discovered, and the forces of the air compelled to do the bidding of man, as those of the earth and sea do now. It is a matter of great encouragement to every Christian that the advances in science, art and discovery are being made tributary to the universal spread of Christ's kingdom.

According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth. (Psa. 48. : 10.)

Pastor's Brevity Wins Farm

The Rev. J. M. Williams, a Methodist minister of a village in Indiana, received a deed the other day for sixty acres of land worth $7,500, from Mr. and Mrs. Burgoyne Davis, because he preached sermons that were short and to the point, while pastor of the church which they attended. Mr. Davis is wealthy, and was so impressed with the brevity and conciseness of the sermons of his pastor that he determined to make him independent. The deed specifies the brevity of Williams' discourses as the consideration received for the land. The farm is one of the most fertile tracts in Montgomery County.

If brevity in the sermon had been the only consideration, we would have counted Mr. Davis a crank. The sermons of Mr. Williams were pointed as well as brief. The length of a sermon depends somewhat upon the breadth and depth of the preacher; some sermons of forty-five minutes or an hour are short, while others of fifteen minutes are too long. In these times, when there is so much besides the sermon in the service, especially of music, it is best that the sermon be reasonably short; but it should be crowded full of the best thought, and be made as pointed as possible. It is likely that many sermons nowadays are spoiled by their excessive brevity. There is the appearance of haste and of discounting the sermon in the important place it should have in the service. It would take the world a long time to be converted by the dapper little twenty-minute essay which is read in some churches as a substitute for a Gospel sermon. The great lesson of the gift of the farm to Mr. Williams was the gratitude these people felt at the genuine spiritual service he had rendered them as a true preacher of the Word and a faithful pastor of the flock. The expectation of the farm was the farthest from Mr. Williams' mind when he was preaching to the Davis family. He had in mind solely the salvation and enrichment of their souls, and because he had their souls so completely as his hire they manifested the expression of gratitude. Not every minister who preaches pointed sermons will be endowed with a farm; but every faithful one may have souls as his possession, which are far more valuable than any earthly estate.

Thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ. (I. Tim. 4:6.)

Rabbits Damage Australia

Fifty years ago there were no rabbits in Australia. Then a sportsman imported a pair for hunting purposes. These multiplied so enormously that millions upon millions of them have destroyed the crops of thousands upon thousands of farms. The government has offered a prize of $25,000 for an effective exterminator of these pests, but none has been furnished. Among those who competed for the prize was M. Pasteur.

It would hardly be thought that so innocent a thing as a rabbit, which has not been armed with weapons of offense or defense, and which is hounded by the dogs, stolen by foxes, carried away by owls and many other creatures, could become such a pest in the community as they have in Australia. But this is the case, and Australia is struggling with an exceedingly serious problem. Everything that lives has something that undertakes to live upon it. The vegetable world has always had its myriad enemies; the forests have been denuded, the orchards plucked and the fields mowed, by some enemy of plant life. The people of Australia, who are of such a splendid type of race, who have adopted one of the best forms of government on the earth, and have set themselves so earnestly to moral reforms, will no doubt discover some cure for the rabbit pest and save their harvests from this and every other enemy. When the children of Israel found such enemies destroying their harvests, they betook themselves to prayer for relief, and Solomon, in his prayer at the dedication of the temple, asks for help from such destruction.

If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpiller; what prayer and supplication soever be made, then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive. (I. Kings 8 : 37-39.)

Sold Babies to Chinese

By a telegram from San Francisco the public is notified that the superintendent of a Home Finding Society had been caught selling white babies to the Chinese, for from five dollars to thirty dollars apiece. We trust that the report may be discovered to be without foundation. For such a violation of the laws of God and man by a professed follower of the Gospel would seem incredible. If there has been any such prostitution of trust in selling sweet, innocent, helpless, little babies into servitude, the proper authorities should not delay a moment in finding the facts and prosecuting all who are in any way responsible for the crime. Christ's love for little children, and his instructions with reference to them, have revolutionized the opinions and habits of the world concerning the treatment of them.

But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea. (Matt. 18 : 6.)

Mirage at Rockaway Beach

Many cottagers of Rockaway Beach and other towns on that shore of Long Island watched, for six minutes or so at sunset recently, two large vessels—a steamship and a schooner—sailing through the skies on a blood-red sea. The mirage was perfectly distinct, the colors even more brilliant than in real life. The ships moved slowly, a quarter of a mile apart, in the same direction, on the same level, far up in the western sky. First came the big four-master, all sails set, green-hulled, moving stately and calm through the flaming waters; then, great thick plumes of black smoke trailing from her two black funnels, came the steamer, with her black hull and her bare masts. The outlines of both ships were clearly marked; the sails of the schooner were white as snow, and every detail of the steamer, as she glided along, was visible. We have often read the story of the mirage in the burning desert, enticing the famished travelers to the streams of water to slake their thirst, only to offer disappointment and death. The mirage on the shore of Long Island was an optical illusion, which had neither deceit nor disastrous consequences, but was a picture most fascinating to behold.

Our lives are ships on the sea of time, bearing their precious freight to some port. There are many eyes upon the ships as they plough through the real water, and there are more eyes far away from them who do not see them but behold their reflections in the sky. How important it is that these ships be things of usefulness and beauty, that their reflection may entrance and inspire the beholders. The unconscious things of life are a thousand times more potential than the conscious. The good or evil that we intend to do is only a fraction of the good or evil which we do, by the unconscious influences that radiate from our lives in all directions. Christ recognizes this unconscious influence of the believer, in his Sermon on the Mount, when he says:

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. (Matt. 5:16.)

Perils of Ease

A London paper has called to notice the dangers to the race arising from too cheap transit facilities. The inducement to ride rather than walk is a temptation which continually confronts the public. This process is calculated to lead to physical and not improbably mental demoralization. If a man can reach his home by a trolley-car or 'bus, he is not going to trouble himself to walk the distance. The very cheapness of travel is robbing people of exercise which is necessary to health. Elevators and moving pavements, though convenient and apparently necessary to modern life, encourage weak muscles and ill health. The race for money is so swift, the competitions of life are so fierce, that we do not take the proper time for eating, or sleep, or exercise. The conveniences of civilized life have come to stay; like all blessings they have their perils, and it will be the part of wisdom for those who want to do the most work, enjoy the greatest happiness and achieve the highest destiny, to so adjust themselves to these inventions that they will do as little harm and as much good as possible. In the Christian economy the body is so intimately related to the soul that anything that would make it strong and healthy should be sacredly adopted. Any invention that would prevent pure air for the lungs, good light and health exercise should be reckoned with as a danger.

What! Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God? (I. Cor. 6:19.)

Many Noted Guests Visit Mont-Lawn

"Fort Plenty"

The children are seen marching from the Fort after luncheon

OUR Children's Paradise at beautiful Mont-Lawn is acquiring a national fame. During the last few weeks many distinguished Americans have visited the Home, inspected the model dormitories and marveled at the perfect arrangements in every department. They have watched the three hundred and thirty little lads and lasses in their clever evolutions and drills on the big lawn, have seen them enthusiastically saluting the flag, have noted their marching in and out of the great dining hall of "Fort Plenty," and have heard their wonderful singing of hymns and patriotic songs in the only Children's Temple on this continent, if not in the world. Not a few of the visitors have addressed the children from the platform of the Temple, and have given them much excellent advice. All the speakers have warmly praised the Home, its management and the excellence of the entertainment, moral and physical, which it provides for three thousand poor children of the metropolis every year.

One of these notable visitors was Miss Mabel T. Boardman, the leader of the American National Red Cross, who has recently been presented with a civic crown of gold by the King of Italy, in recognition of the splendid services which she, as the head of her organization, recently rendered in relieving the sick, destitute and injured people of Sicily and Calabria immediately after the recent disastrous earthquake. Miss Boardman came all the way from Manchester, Mass., to see the children at Mont-Lawn. She was delighted with her visit. To her, the gathering of these hundreds of little folks of many different nationalities, and all intensely enjoying every moment of the sunny hours, formed a picture not to be soon forgotten. She made a short and very appropriate address, in which she told them that they should try to memorize the pleasant scenes they had witnessed at Mont-Lawn and that these recollections would form a mental picture book, which they could enjoy when they went back to their own homes. The children gave the fair speaker the Chautauqua salute, the waving of white handkerchiefs being supplemented by cheers such as only happy, fresh-air children can give.

Among those who on recent occasions spoke to the children from the Temple platform, were Mr. Melville E. Stone, of Chicago, general manager of the Associated Press; Mr. E. R. Johnstone, of New York; Dr. Leander Chamberlain, of New York; Rev. H. A. Tupper, Jr.; Rear-Admiral Sigsbee, United States Navy; Editor Joe Chapple, of the National Magazine, Boston; Dr. John G. Hallimond; Rev. E. L. Fox, New York, and others. Harry Steele Morrison, the "boy traveler," told of the distinguished men and women he had met in his travels. Rev. Robert E. Kelley, of Bedford Street M. E. Church, New York, spoke of the importance of obedience, of gratitude and unselfishness, of love and kindness for one another; and the quick responses of the little folks showed how they understood and appreciated his address. Dr. Ezra B. Sanford spoke of the "Musical Message of the Mont-Lawn Bells." One of the bells he called the "Inter-racial Bell," whose message was that God made us all of one blood, and we are all his children. Another was the "Interdenominational Bell," which gives the note of the teachers at Mont-Lawn: that every one might become useful in Christian service. The third was the "Recreational Bell," which had in it the call to the lawn, the march, the singing, the swimming pool and the playground. The last was the "Educational Bell," which represented the hosts of contributors to the work at Mont-Lawn, who by their generosity were teaching a great and noble lesson to the whole world—a lesson of leadership in Christian philanthropy and in the moral and physical training of thousands of little children from the homes of the poor.

On Being Grumpy

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

HAS it ever occurred to you to notice the curious relationship between sound and sense apparent in words used in common speech? Suppose you take the word grumpy. It suggests grumble; and grumble, as every one is aware, in turn suggests murmuring, fault-finding and peevishness. The grumbler is grumpy. The grumpy person does not come boldly out, state a grievance and try to have it removed, but on the contrary sulks and pouts, looks injured, wears the air of a martyr, is aggressively silent and disagreeably curt, and if induced to speak is very apt to growl. A grumpy child may be sent in disgrace to the nursery, but a grumpy father cannot be so easily disposed of. There he sits at the head of the table, or in a comfortable armchair, with a newspaper before him, absolutely radiating displeasure in every line of his countenance and from every glance of his moody eyes. Half-grown boys watch their opportunity and slip out of the house into the friendly dusk, sidling off to spend their evening with companions who will laugh and be gay. Girls run away to their own rooms, leaving their mother to sit in the shadow of her grumpy husband, and try, dear saint that she is, to banish his gloom and bring back his lost cheerfulness. When mother herself is grumpy, woe descends on the household. A brisk-scolding mother with a sharp tongue is bad enough, yet not so bad as the grumpy one who manages to envelope the household in the chill of a refrigerator and the darkness of a cellar. A hail-storm does damage while it lasts, but it is soon over, while a black frost may endure for days.

When the maid in the kitchen is grumpy the family have errands elsewhere. They prefer to leave her to fight out her battle alone over saucepans and kettles. She, poor soul, may have a better excuse for ill-temper than those who employ her; her dearest ones being often on the other side of the globe and her ordinary life rather dull and aloof from social intercourse. Still, if she persists in grumpiness, she will probably discover that the household can get along without her. Grumpiness is not an asset worth keeping on the schedule if one would succeed in business. The practical issue for us is, how shall we get rid of grumpiness if the bad habit has become ours? Shall we sit in a cave and growl? Bears do this. Shall we prowl about wearing black looks and wrapping ourselves in a mantle of ebon hue, with an aspect grand, gloomy and peculiar? Saul did that, and when the mood was at its worst he threw his javelin at the youthful musician who was trying to charm away the evil spirit. Surely, we in our pleasant modern homes where we may have books and work and helpful play, where we have pictures and telephones and may have agreeable company at will, should disdain emulating a bear of the forest or a weary king of ancient times.

Let us vanquish grumpiness by the only method that is warranted not to fail. Resist the devil, the Bible tells us, and he will flee from you. If grumpiness come from indigestion or insomnia, send for the physician. If it arrive from pure perversity, try fighting it with prayer.

Fans and Parasols

This season has been marked by a revival of fashion as regards that graceful and useful article, the parasol. For several summers girls and women have treated the parasol as an encumbrance. They have not minded being tanned and freckled, and have rather overlooked the fact that aside from its utility a parasol that matches a costume adds to a lady's garb a really fine finishing touch. This year the shops display parasols of every size, shape and color, some with long carved handles and others with short smooth ones, some large and some small, some for the pedestrian and others to be held as shields by her who rides in a motor-car or drives in her carriage. A parasol is a distinctly artistic and ornamental affair, and if a woman can have only one she should select it in dark blue or green, with handle of carved ivory or wood, as she prefers. If she can afford several, she may have them to match her toilettes, but so lavish a display is quite unnecessary.

Fans are always in order. As a gift to wife, sister or sweetheart, a fan is never a mistake. For durability and satisfaction, the large palm leaf outranks every other, but any pretty folding fan, or any dainty affair of silk, satin or lace has a suitability for some function or other and is sure to be reckoned by the average woman as one of the things that she loves.

Pardon a reminder that no one who uses a fan should wield it to the discomfort of her friends and neighbors. Even on the hottest summer day it is not agreeable to have a steady stream of chilled air fanned upon one's back when sitting in church.

"RING-AROUND-A-ROSY"

Roaming through the greenwood
All the livelong day,
Where the birds are singing,
And the flowers are gay;

"Ring-around-a-rosy,"
Merrily they play,
Blossom-time will soon be past,
Seize it while ye may.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—About the Engagement Ring. "If one cares for only one ring, is it proper to wear a plain gold band for an engagement, or should that only be worn as a wedding ring?" There is no real necessity to wear an engagement ring, but a bride should have her wedding ring on her wedding day. The wedding ring is always a plain gold band or circlet.

—Louise. You ask whether it is polite to supply a word or name when the person with whom you are talking has apparently forgotten what she wishes to say, and hesitates as if searching for a clue. You must decide this question for yourself. As a rule, it is better and kinder to wait in silence until the friend finds the word that for the moment has evaded her. Never hasten to offer help of this particular sort, and, if you do it at all, be tactful and unobtrusive.

How to Read the Newspaper

PERHAPS you will be tempted to skip this paragraph on the ground that any one who knows how to read knows how to read the newspaper. You were never more mistaken. One person in ten has mastered the art of discovering all that is worth perusal in the sheet that comes into the home as a daily, semi-weekly or weekly messenger, bringing the news of the world to the lowliest door. The other nine read the paper in a haphazard fashion, guided partly by the headings in large type and partly by a wish to ascertain the most sensational novelty in the editor's power to relate. When one is obliged to read the papers by proxy his enjoyment is often curtailed by the fact that the reader officiating in the capacity of assistant purveyor has no intelligent plan on which to proceed. If, for example, a man is interested in the reports of finance and the ups and downs of the stock market, if he cares for sport or foreign politics or the proceedings in Congress, it is hard for him to listen with patience to society gossip, bits about fashion, descriptions of crime and details about the latest international engagement. Yet, unless his reader be well trained, he or she will often prove unsatisfactory in the matter of discovering what is vital to a man who would keep abreast of the world's current.

Women frequently glance first at the notices of marriages and deaths, and sometimes express disappointment when familiar names appear under neither of these captions. An enormous amount of time is wasted by many readers in following the course of trials in criminal courts. These reports ought to be condensed, and much that is published should never have been told beyond the confines of the courtroom. So long, however, as the impression prevails that the public desires to hear every word that witnesses have to say the newspapers will bristle with such information.

In reading the newspaper settle in your own mind some definite object. Look first for news about that. Pass over much that has no interest for you, and devote your attention to that which will repay you in suggested ideas, instruction or thought enrichment. Reports of lectures and sermons, reviews of new books and letters written by travelers in various portions of the earth are well worth reading. Mere gossip and scandal might better be omitted, nor should it find a lodgment in any mind. Read the paper according to plan, and its worth to you will be doubled and trebled.

Feeding the Baby

A child of three is too young to eat everything that is freely given to older peopie. A little one at that age should have several meals a day, but each should be very simple. A cereal with milk and bread and butter form this child's best breakfast. Fruit, either cooked or raw, may be given with the breakfast, but the fruit must be thoroughly ripe if uncooked. Before the midday nap, bread and butter and a glass of milk are in order. The child's dinner should include meat and vegetables, and may begin with broth, but meat should be allowed only once a day. The evening meal may be of rice and milk, of oatmeal, hominy or any other cereal. Milk should form a large part of a child's diet until the first ten years at least are past. This dietary is one recommended by a physician whose specialty is the care of children.

Women Discuss the Chinese Question

"WHO should teach the Chinese?" is the theme of many letters that have reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, nearly all of them from bright American women, who are personally engaged in Chinese Sunday School or mission work and who, therefore, write from personal experience. These ladies take the opposite view from Miss Helen Clark, whose letter appeared in a recent issue.

Once a Waif, now a Preacher

A Massachusetts Teacher's Views

Miss Dorothy Brooks, a bright young American woman, who has had seven years' experience as a teacher in the Chinese Union Sunday School of Springfield, Mass., has written a remarkably clever letter in defense of her sister teachers, whom she considers as having been unfairly judged in the recent controversy over the "single scholar system," arising out of the tragic Sigel case. She frankly disagrees with those who oppose the teaching of Chinese by women. In her own school the teachers are nearly all women, "for the reason (she says) that men will not give their time to it." The teaching is on the kindergarten principle, and few men have the patience to devote to it. This lady's school seems to be a model of its kind, both as to superintendent and teachers. No woman under twenty is allowed to teach, and none who cannot maintain proper dignity. Much good has been accomplished. The Chinese, Miss Brooks writes, are like Americans—some are good and some evil; those who have studied them at close range would never pronounce them all bad. Some, she admits, come to Sunday School only for instruction in English; some merely pretend interest to create a good impression. As to personal peril to the white woman teacher, this writer declares that "a teacher who has the right idea of her holy mission is as safe in New York as she would be in China."

Mrs. Baldwin Defends the Teachers

Mrs. Stephen L. Baldwin sends a long letter, in which she deals exhaustively with the subject under discussion. She writes: "Is it American or Christian, because of one crime, not connected with the Sunday Schools—he not a scholar, she not a teacher—to try to destroy the chief Christian work attempted in all the East for this people? A like attempt some years ago was overruled for good; and, if this second attack should result in moving to strong work by our different mission boards, backing these schools and inducing men to share the self-denying service of our women, again the wrath will be overruled to the advance of His kingdom."

Mrs. Baldwin tells of her long experience in China. She reviews the history of the Chinese Sunday School work in this country, and pays a glowing tribute to those consecrated women who gave their time and abilities to teaching the Chinese. She replies, paragraph by paragraph, to Miss Clark's article, answering all its statements with facts drawn from an extensive personal knowledge of Chinese mission work in New York at the present time. She also replies to the four questions propounded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as follows:

1. If there is one man entirely ignorant of English, one teacher is necessary; if several, put them in a class, and so with all. I prefer the class, not from any fear of frail woman, but because the teachers are so scarce.

2. Never has it come to my knowledge "that disagreeable results have grown out of this system," and right here I want to declare that, of all whom I have known to marry (and they are comparatively few), I cannot recall one pupil who has married his teacher.

3. I do not consider that this (single scholar) system places the woman in peril. In our Peking University, our Anglo-Chinese College at Foochow, and in the institutions of higher education standing in front ranks in China, some of our most valued instructors are college-bred women, married and single, young and old, and they are held in the highest esteem by the hundreds of young men in these seats of learning. If women can teach such in China safely, can they be in great peril in Christian America, even in New York City?

4. What substitute would I suggest? That which I have long desired. Let the Home or Foreign Boards of the different denominations take up this work in a solid, business-like method; the secretaries meeting together to map out the work between the boards, that there be no over-lapping or friction, each having a church or chapel and school, after the very wise and successful methods of the Presbyterians, who are carrying on such a fine work in New York, under the care of that good man and woman, the Rev. Huie-Kin and wife. Let each secure, if possible—though it is hard for me to say it, knowing the need of workers in China—a native pastor from the Canton province, as the men here are very largely from there and need one who can speak their dialect. Give the scholars the Gospel, English Sunday Schools, social evenings, and be not the least afraid even to welcome them to your homes.

A Practical Woman's Idea

Mrs. B——, Newton Centre, Mass. (who desires that her name be not published), writes: "I have read with interest the opinions expressed through your paper regarding the present system of conducting Chinese Sunday Schools. I have been engaged in work for the Chinese for the past ten years, both in the East and during several visits to the Pacific Coast. I have had two Chinese girls in my own home at different times, and at the present time am educating a young Chinese boy. I was superintendent of the Chinese Sunday School in our own church in Lynn. I endorse every word written in your paper by Rev. Sanford C. Hearn, pastor of the M. E. Church, Yonkers, N. Y. He shows what a man of wide experience and unprejudiced mind thinks.

"I do not approve of a young, silly girl teaching a Chinaman, or any other man, it matters not what his nationality be. It is not a position for a person of that kind. However, I do not think it is so much a question of age as fitness. We had two or three young women in our Lynn school, among the most dignified and successful of our teachers. We never had any unpleasantness grow out of this system. Personally, I have never received anything but the most courteous treatment and polite words from any of these Chinese men, and I do not believe any woman or even young girl would ever receive disrespectful or discourteous treatment, unless she herself were to blame, and encouraged it."

Against the "Single Scholar" System

Mrs. James T. Beck, superintendent of the Orthodox Friends Chinese Mission, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes giving her experience of missionary work among the Chinese. The work began under her hands, and soon there were eight men and as many women teachers. The Chinese were teachable. There was no trouble about gifts. Her husband assisted her in the work. There were undoubted conversions. Men teachers soon tired and dropped out.

The work was done through an interpreter. Mrs. Beck tells of some remarkable confessions, where the converts afterward conducted prayer meetings. At present there are six workers in the mission and twenty-five to thirty-five students. "We have a Y. M. C. A. of thirty-one members," she writes. "In my opinion, the best instructors are the Chinese themselves." Mrs. Beck concludes by saying: "Deploring the system of singling out one teacher for one student, I feel bound to say I would not allow such a system, for even in appearance it is wrong."

Fourteen Years' Experience

Miss H. H. Harwood, New Haven, Conn., writes: "I have taught Chinese fourteen years (two and a half in Chinatown, New York, and never, by word, look or action, was I insulted by any Chinese man there—in houses, street or mission. I was always treated with the greatest deference and respect by unconverted as well as Christian), and by God's grace, who has already greatly blessed my feeble efforts by allowing me to bring souls to him, I intend to keep on while I live. Gifts I have received—so has every teacher, male and female, pastor and superintendent (generally theirs is the more costly, being a joint gift from the school); but my choicest possessions are the photos (which enable me to remember and recognize old scholars after years of absence) and letters telling of faith in Jesus and thanking me for helping them to know up to God."

A Chinese Sunday School Worker's View

Mrs. N. P. Chew, native Chinese Christian mission worker, writes as follows: "The press, in dealing with the Sigel case, is doing a great injustice to the Chinese people and the Chinese converts in this country. The Chinese have been in this country for more than sixty years. At one time, there was a Chinese population of 150,000, and at the present time there are about 65,000 in the United States; yet the Sigel murder is the only case of the kind ever committed by a member of our race during the entire history of the Chinese sojourn in America. We do not claim, as a race, that we are better than others, but we will not concede that we are worse. We, as a people, are not so bad morally as the papers would make us out to be. How often do you hear of crimes committed by us against American women, either outrages or murders? As to crime against the virtue of womanhood, it is almost unknown among our people, either in this country or in China.

A Young Chinese Preacher

"The statements that more American women are degraded than Chinese converted in the missions, and that women who work in these missions for the Chinese invariably end up with wrecked lives, etc., are monstrous falsehoods. During twenty-nine years' residence in this country, I have had the good fortune to come into close contact with the missions and their workers in many parts of the country, from the Pacific to the New England States, and I have not yet personally known of a case where the life of a woman worker was wrecked or ruined; while, on the other hand, I have been personally acquainted with a host of women mission workers who declared that their relations with the Chinese in connection with their work have always been cordial and most satisfactory; that their pupils have invariably been respectful and grateful, and that they preferred the work among the Chinese to that among other nationalities."

Chinese Schools in San Francisco

Chinese mission evening schools and Sunday Schools have been in operation in San Francisco for over thirty years, and during all that time we have yet to hear of a mission school teacher being treated with anything but respect. In very few cases has a class been composed of one teacher with a single scholar, except occasionally in the Sunday School; but even in those cases there has never been any bad results. Experience in San Francisco shows that a young girl is in no more danger teaching a Chinese man than a man of any other race, and as to whether it is proper and safe for a young girl to teach any man in this manner depends entirely on the girl; in some cases it would be all right—in others, not.

Chinese scholars should be treated, and Chinese schools be conducted, on the same plan as any other schools—in graded classes. It is seldom that there is but one scholar of the same grade; should there be, a suitable teacher can certainly be found. But in San Francisco's Sunday Schools, classes generally range from five or six up.

Years and years of actual mission school work show that women teachers are perfectly safe in teaching Chinese schools, notwithstanding what men (calling themselves missionary workers) say in your recent article. Hundreds of girls have been murdered in America by Americans, and this is not counted in disparagement of American manhood; while the number murdered by Chinese (be they mission school workers or others) can be counted on one hand, with plenty of fingers to spare.

We ask only what is reasonable when we ask that the Chinese race, and the Christian Chinese in particular, be not judged by one man who was in reality a highbinder and who was a traitor to the ranks of a mission school where he occasionally went. Traitors are never considered as representatives of their race.

A Canadian Teacher's View

Personally, I have worked among "China boys" for years and have never seen or heard of anything that could bring reproach on the work. No evil look or word has come from any of our boys to his teacher. We have some very young girls in our schools as teachers, but they are steady, reliable, and interested in the work. The teacher has a great influence over the scholar. Several of our scholars here have gone back to China as missionaries through the influence of a godly Christian girl or woman. P. SINCLAIR.

Life Lessons from Romans*

THERE is something inspiring in the very words which Paul chooses. He deals in strong phrases, and fears not to call the vile sins of his flock by their right names. He confirms in this wonderful epistle all that history has told us of the degeneracy of the Romans at the beginning of our era. It has been exploited in fiction by Bulwer, D'Israeli, Sienkiewicz and many others, and no one of them has ever exaggerated the facts. It is doubtful if there has ever been a more corrupt period in the whole history of society. Even among those who had sinned most deeply there were many who recoiled from the loathsomeness of it all. The world was ripe for the pure and holy religion of Jesus Christ.

But even those who admired the laws which he set, and which Paul so ardently and eloquently preached, were often unable to keep them. They could echo his heartfelt cry: "What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that I do"—for the flesh is strong with all men. The horrible sensuality of old Rome died hard. Even after the empire became nominally Christian, and a Pope administered both the temporal and spiritual power, sin held high carnival in court and hall. The fierce wrath of a Savonarola and the noble preaching of the ascetic St. Francis could scarcely check it. Read Bryce's Holy Roman Empire, and the numerous other histories of the Middle-Age epochs, and see how hardly Rome and its provinces shook off the sins which centuries of irresponsible power had fastened upon them.

The preaching of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries emphasized most of all the awful fact of punishment after death. Men were to embrace Christianity in order to escape the lake of fire. How vitally they misunderstood the chief purpose of Paul's preaching may be judged from the extracts set for this past week's reading. The punishment after death was indeed described by our Saviour, and by Paul, Peter and others; but it is plain that Paul means us most to beware of the death-in-life of sin. "To be carnally minded," he says, "is death" (Rom. 8:6). "Sin revived, and I died" (Rom. 7:9). Just as Christ was raised from the dead, so our mortal bodies shall be "quickened"; that is, made alive after the death of sin, "by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

It is sin which kills in our hearts noble aspirations and the thirst for all that is pure and noble. We can see it plainly in the sin of drunkenness. The drunkard soon becomes obtuse to the promptings of self-respect, family love and pride, business honor—every good impulse. The same thing is true of all other kinds of sin—such as persistent business obliquity, habitual profanity, or neglect or irritability toward one's family. What is the death of the body compared with this death of the soul—a death destined to go on after this life is ended, and passing into acute and awful torment?

Another great lesson of this wonderful Book is that of the blessed departure of fear from the heart of the Christian. "The spirit of bondage to fear" is forever passed away, so long as sin is shunned and hated. The pure shining of the Sun of Righteousness in the heart disperseth the foul mists of fear—that foe to manliness, to effort, to all success. "If thou doest that which is evil, be afraid" (Rom. 13:4). It is the heathen that are bound and shackled by fear. We are "saved by hope" (Rom. 8:24)—hope, the very daughter of God. If we have not hope, we are miserable. If we have hope, all day our hearts shall have zest in toil, and we shall have songs in the night.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, September 5. TEXT: Rom. 12: 1-21.

Multiplication by Loss*

ONE of our great poets has written, "When we wander here and there, we then do come most nigh." The road to success and to perfection leads through strange countries. We follow the call of daily duty, and not infrequently it seems to divert us far away from our heart's desire; when, lo! there is a sudden turn, and we are face to face with what we had loved and had thought lost. God was leading us, perhaps unwilling and rebellious, in the way most likely to reach the object of our hopes, though we knew it not. There are few of us whose faith has not been thus rebuked.

"He that seeketh his life shall lose it," said our great Teacher. It is a poor motive that we should deny ourselves ostensibly for Christ's sake only, when we are really seeking a selfish reward; but it is a blessed thought when, through anguish, we gladly obey his clear call that, in the end, he will heal every wound.

Wayland, in his famous Moral Science, makes one remark which has become since then a common quotation: "Honesty is the best policy; but he who is honest because it is the best policy is not an honest man."

He who subtracts and divides, saying that he does it for Christ's sake, but who really does it hoping for something again, because the promise is to that effect, will fail of his reward, if not here, then hereafter; and yet, by one of those singular paradoxes which confront us on every side in the moral world, we cannot help knowing that tribulation, through first patience, then experience, then hope, worketh out finally "abundance of grace."

This strange mode of increasing our spiritual life—increasing it by giving it away, increasing it by, as it were, exhausting ourselves and lowering our own vitality, has been the puzzle of philosophers since time began. It is like the rising of the tides:

> Though the tired wave, inward breaking,
> Seems here no painful inch to gain,
> Far back in creek and inlet making,
> Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

"The spiritual life," says President King," must be one of gradual growth and patient, steady endeavor. The maintenance of any of our ideals demands some fighting; but the true man cannot be willing, either for himself or for others, to draw away from these fighting forces. George Macdonald's rector in the Quiet Neighborhood says to his doubting, listless friend, "You know the Faery Queen. Think how long the Red Cross Knight traveled with Lady Truth—Una, you know—without learning to believe in her; and how much longer still without ever seeing her face. For my part, may God give me strength to follow till I die. Only it is not by any agony of intellect that I expect to discover her."

It is the giving and yielding soul—ever subtracting from itself—that out of the few loaves and fishes makes the feast which feeds the multitude; or, to use another of the great figures, so expends the talents given him that they double and treble under his lavish hand.

In one of his most beautiful poems the great laureate made Gareth "forglory" undergo "the sooty yoke of kitchen vassalage." He "couched at night with grimy kitchen knaves," turned the broach, drew water and hewed wood, and in the end became one of the chief knights of the court of the stainless Arthur. It is in so far an allegory of the Christian life.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXX—Continued

"NEVER mind; Mother gives a dinner for him next Wednesday, and you'll see him then," said Preston. "He's really coming, too, you understand; and I suppose that is something of a triumph. Anyhow, mother so impressed me with the grave importance of getting his immediate consent before anybody else got a chance to gobble him up, that I am not sure I didn't greet him with, 'How do you do, sir? Will you please dine with us next Wednesday night?'"

"Then I suppose I shall have to be content with that," sighed Florence. "And it's only Thursday now. Only think—almost a week to wait! How shall I endure it!"

"Oh, but he plays Tuesday night, remember. You'll see him then."

"So I shall! I forgot that," she laughed, as she turned away.

Neither Mrs. Preston nor Florence was at home when Marco called at eight o'clock, and only Howard Preston received the young man in the library; but to Marco, at least, there seemed to be nothing lacking in the evening's enjoyment. For three long hours the two men sat and talked before the dancing flames in the fireplace. And when those three hours had passed, Preston knew the history of those eight years of study and struggle and success. He knew something of the boy's temptations and triumphs, both musically and morally; and he knew something of what this home-coming meant to the youth who had tried so hard to "make good." But he did not know—from Marco—anything about the adoring public that had cast itself at the young violinist's feet.

"And your father—you have seen him?" Preston asked, as his visitor rose to go.

A quick shadow crossed the younger man's face.

"Yes. He was happy and comfortable; but so changed! I had hoped to find him better. Poor dad!" he murmured, after a pause; "he had every New York paper spread out on his bed when I got there, with my picture staring up at him from each one. After all, it makes him happy, and I'm glad he's—pleased. It almost reconciles me to all this—" he shrugged his shoulders with a smile as a finish to his sentence.

CHAPTER XXXI

"YOU WERE AN EGYPTIAN PRINCESS"

ON Tuesday evening the widely heralded young violinist, Signor Marco Covino, made his bow to a brilliant, fashionable and critical New York audience—an audience that meant to decide for itself whether this slender, clean-shaven, dark-eyed young man was really the wonder he was reported to be.

Perhaps half the audience knew that the man had played his violin as a boy on their own city streets. A much smaller portion had a vivid recollection of a youth who played under the most dramatic circumstances at Mrs. Preston's musicale, eight years before. But where then there had been moonlight and romance there was now the pitiless glare of electric lights and fierce criticism. A few in the audience had heard him in Paris, London or Berlin. These last fortunate individuals sat back in their chairs with an air of calm superiority, as if they knew what the verdict would be.

A pretty girl in pale blue, with a crown of golden hair, watched the violinist with curious absorption from the moment of his first appearance. Her eyes grew dark, as with a vague, haunting memory, that refused to become clear. That it was not the music alone which was causing her interest was evidenced later when, during a pause in the programme, she leaned forward in her chair and said:

"Mother, dear, where have I seen that man before? Didn't we hear him once somewhere, when we were in Europe a year ago?"

"No, Florence," laughed the lady. "We tried to, once, but I was ill, and we couldn't go to the concert. Don't you remember? At all events, we didn't see him. One doesn't meet a Signor Covino—and then forget it.'

"But I have seen him; I know I've seen him."

"You've seen his picture at every turn, my dear, like all the rest of us. That is all. Or perhaps you did see him when he used to come to the house years ago."

"No, I never saw him then," returned the girl, decidedly. "I know that, for I took special pains not to see him. I think I was a bit jealous of my 'big brother,'" she explained, coloring slightly as she answered the surprised look in the other's eyes. "But I have seen this man somewhere. I—" The music interrupted her words, and she leaned back in her chair, the puzzled look still deep in her eyes.

New York went wild the next morning, as only New York can—sometimes. The press, with one accord, hailed the violinist as one of the greatest virtuosos of the day; and the critics vied with each other in lauding his purity of intonation, his beauty of tone, his keen rhythmic feeling and his astounding mastery of technical difficulties. Every selection that he played—with one exception—was something already well known to lovers of the violin; but the critics declared that each one was like a new creation, so rare was his skill, so marvelously did he throw into each one the dignity, fire and charm of his own individuality. The one novelty among his selections was a composition of his own, recently finished; and upon this the critics were no less lavish in bestowing their praise, hailing him, indeed, as a great artist in composition as well as in interpretation.

The verdict of the feminine world of fashion was equally evident. The young violinist's rooms were heavy with the scent of innumerable floral offerings; and his waste-basket overflowed with perfumed notes and invitations to countless social functions, nearly all of which he refused. To Mrs. Preston's, on Wednesday evening, however, he went.

Mrs. Preston welcomed him cordially and with evident appreciation of the honor of his presence. In the background her son smiled a little; he was thinking of the expression of consternation that the first visit of this young man brought into his mother's face eight years before.

There was to be a dinner, followed by a musicale. So far as was possible, Mrs. Preston had invited to the latter the same guests that had attended her now famous musicale eight years before. She had achieved one other dramatic victory, too; Marco was to play—and he had agreed to play in the alcove, with the music-room darkened. Even nature had lent her aid, and had obligingly provided a great full moon.

To be sure, Marco had strongly objected to this arrangement. He preferred electric lights and conventionality; but at Mrs. Preston's evident disappointment he seemed disturbed.

A Pioneer Itinerant Preacher

The Hut in Which Watters Died
At El Nido, Fairfield Co., Va.

COMPARATIVELY few people, even in Washington, are aware that when they flit past El Nido, a little wayside station on the Great Falls and Old Dominion Electric Railroad, in Fairfax County, Virginia, about six miles from Washington, they pass in plain view of a grave that might very appropriately be among those of the illustrious who sleep in adjacent Arlington, for the occupant of this grave was a hero.

On a little knoll, shaded by tall, grand old trees, marked by a simple-veined marble shaft, enclosed by a neat iron fence, isolated, lonely, but in the very midst of a farming district that is strangely beautiful, lies buried Rev. William Watters, the first American-born Methodist itinerant preacher in this country. In 1889 the Virginia M. E. Conference realized that it was its duty to erect a suitable monument. He was a preacher for fifty-five years. When he began preaching in 1772 there were less than one thousand Methodists in America, but when he died the handful had increased to nearly half a million, and now, eighty-two years later, the Methodists of the United States number six millions.

Looking backward to that distant past, when this country was sparsely settled, we realize how Mr. Watters and his contemporaries, in assuming the responsibilities of the itinerancy, faced a certainty of poverty, privations, danger, ridicule and opposition, with a good prospect of violence and martyrdom.

This is the inscription on the monument:

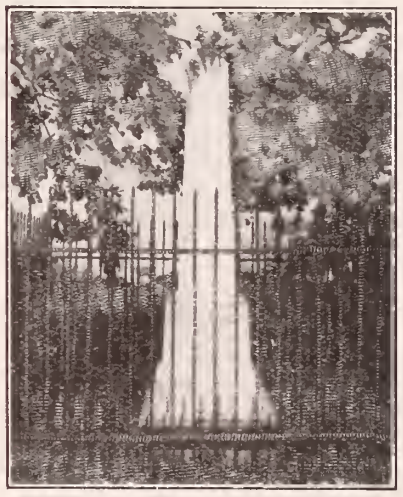
IN MEMORY OF
REV. WILLIAM WATTERS,
The First Native Itinerant Methodist Preacher in America.
BORN OCTOBER 16, 1751,
DIED MARCH 29, 1827.

He was a pioneer leading the way for the vast army of American Methodist Itinerants, having the Everlasting Gospel to preach.

Fervent in spirit, prudent in council, abundant in labors, skillful in winning souls, he was a workman that needed not to be ashamed.

The Methodists of Washington in June made a pilgrimage to the tomb of Mr. Watters, and there sang hymns, offered prayers and pronounced eulogies in honor of this sturdy man, this fearless product of a new country—one of nature's noblemen, who kept the faith and fought such a good fight.

ALLEN E. HILL.



Watters' Grave at El Nido

THE STORY OF MARCO

Then he laughed suddenly, and said, with his old boyish twang:

"Sure, Mis' Preston, I'll do it for ye. Mr. Preston here's been mighty good ter me, an' I'd do that an' more for him an' you!"

For an instant Mrs. Preston stared; then she laughed softly, and clapped her hands.

"Thank you. You're splendid!—and I believe you could act as well as play, you gifted boy," she added over her shoulder, as she hurried away.

Among Mrs. Preston's guests there was one, at least, who had not been present eight years before. She was a charming girl in white, with turquoises at her throat and in her hair. Eight years before she had been in bed downstairs, blinking sleepily. To-night she was very much awake, and her eyes shone like stars when young Covino was presented to her. He started a little as she gave him her hand and smiled frankly into his eyes.

"I'm glad to meet Mr. Covino," she said cordially, "and know the man with whom I shared my big brother eight years ago."

"Thank you; then I did see you long ago," he exclaimed, his puzzled eyes clearing. "That explains it."

"Oh, but you didn't see me," smiled the girl. "As I remember, I kept very carefully out of your way. I was inclined to be jealous, I'm afraid, of my brother's affection. I didn't relish sharing it."

"But, surely, I——"

The announcement of dinner cut short his words. After that he could only watch her covertly from across the table where he sat at Mrs. Preston's side. It was not, indeed, until after coffee was served that he found an opportunity to speak to her again. Then abruptly he went straight to the point.

"Isn't there a sect somewhere, Miss Preston, that believe we meet sometimes a man or a woman whom we have known, perhaps, in another life, centuries before? Isn't there a poem that begins, 'When you were an Egyptian Princess, and I was a—' some kind of a 'slave'?"

Covino's voice was light, but his eyes were grave and carried a curious intensity in their depths.

"Really," she laughed in some embarrassment, "I'm not sure that my stock of poetry isn't somewhat limited. Still, it seems to me I have heard something of the kind—once."

"But—were you the Egyptian Princess?" he questioned still earnestly. For a moment they gazed straight into each other's puzzled eyes. Then he threw back his head with a smile. "I surely have met you somewhere. I wonder where it was!"

SURE TO ASK

The Kind of Coffee when Postum is Well-made.

"Three great coffee drinkers were my old school friend and her two daughters.

"They were always complaining and taking medicine. I determined to give them Postum instead of coffee when they visited me, so without saying anything to them about it, I made a big pot of Postum the first morning, using four heaping teaspoonfuls to the pint of water and let it boil twenty minutes, stirring down occasionally.

"Before the meal was half over, each one passed up her cup to be refilled, remarking how fine the coffee was. The mother asked for a third cup and inquired as to the brand of coffee I used. I didn't answer her question just then, for I had heard her say a while before that she didn't like Postum unless it was more than half old-fashioned coffee.

"After breakfast I told her that the coffee she liked so well at breakfast was pure Postum and the reason she liked it was because it was properly made, that is, it was boiled long enough to bring out the flavour.

"I have been brought up from a nervous, wretched invalid, to a fine condition of physical health by leaving off coffee and using Postum.

"I am doing all I can to help the world out of coffee slavery to Postum freedom, and have earned the gratitude of many, many friends." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

AN INSPIRING FAREWELL*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"GOOD-BY words!" Who among us has not felt their keen edge cutting our very hearts? "Good-by words" spoken to us by dear ones going into distant lands and places, or perhaps to that bourne from whence no traveler ever returned. Let us each and all recall such words that we have ourselves spoken, or that have been spoken to us. It will make our hearts tender, and render us all the more capable of entering into the study of Paul's farewell address to the Ephesians. It has been said of that address, "It is a rich legacy to the Church in all ages and lands," and also that "It is a precious and pregnant document."

It will be remembered by us that Paul had left the city of Ephesus just after the labor union riot of the silversmiths. He had been in Ephesus teaching and preaching the Gospel publicly, and from house to house, for about three years. A church had been organized, of so much force and importance that the business of dealing in idols had been so lessened that the silversmiths declared their craft was in danger; hence the riot. Paul left Ephesus and went into Macedonia, and then into Greece. After nearly a year, he came again to the region of Ephesus, but being on a vessel, and on his way to Jerusalem, which city he hoped to reach in time for the feast of Pentecost, he determined not to revisit Ephesus. But when the ship stopped at Miletus for several hours, he sent to Ephesus for the elders of the church to come to Miletus to see him. It was only twenty miles or so away. They might come to him, but Paul could not go to them, because the ship might sail at any hour. We are not told how many came, but presumably all of them. And they came not alone to see Paul, but the goodly company of those who were voyaging with him: Silas, Timothy and Luke, and the seven men whose names are given in Acts 20:4, delegates from the various provinces going to Jerusalem to present the contributions of their several churches to the impoverished disciples in Judea. It must have given Paul peculiar pleasure to take this group of men with him as examples of what had been done in Asia by the preaching of the Gospel. We are reminded of how Columbus took with him to Spain some natives of the new land he had discovered, that he might thereby impress the people of Spain with its reality and importance. It was a time of rejoicing when the elders of Ephesus met Paul at Miletus. The occasion was one of great moment, not only to those who participated in it, but to Christians in all ages.

Some words are worthy to be engraved upon stone, others upon silver, others upon gold; but the words spoken by Paul on that occasion God considered worthy to be placed in his Book—the Bible—"for teaching, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Let us, therefore, study the words spoken to the elders of Ephesus by Paul. And along with the words let us study the teacher, for the personality of the teacher interprets the words. A wonderful preparation the teacher had had for that meeting. It was a walk alone with God for twenty miles or more from Troas to Assos, along a road sheltered by great oak trees, which made it seem like a cloister. His companions had remained upon the ship, and were to meet him at Assos, and pick him up. Paul was not tired of his companions, but he wanted some new tone from heaven. Dr. Hillis has said: "Saddened by life's sordidness, depressed by the avarice, cunning and cruelty of the street, the soul needs its days of revery and worship for rising into purer, sweeter air where tranquillity dwells. There walking, musing, praying, ardor will return to the jaded sense. The fret and fever will pass away, and the soul go forth with heaven's perfume and with enduring strength from the eternal God."

From his walk of communion with God Paul must have brought with him the very atmosphere of God, just as travelers who go to a certain valley in Arabia where odorous shrubs and spices grow, and where the air is filled with fragrance, carry with them in their clothing and bodies, after emerging from it, the sweet perfume for days. If all teachers would come into their Sunday School classes from such a Presence, how glorious would be the result!

Paul and the Elders

Paul sought those for whom he had a message. He sent word for them to come, because he had something to say to them. If he had left it to them to come or not, as they pleased, very few if any at all would have been there. A boy who had been in constant attendance at a certain Sunday School moved to a distant part of the city, but he still continued attending the same Sunday School. When asked the reason why he did so, he replied: "Because they love a fellow over there." Paul loved the fellows in Ephesus!

Paul met the elders in a tender and humble spirit. He reminded them how, in lowliness and in tears oftentimes, he had done his work among them, and so did he attune their hearts to sympathy. St. Augustine being asked, "What is the first thing in religion?" replied, "Humility;" and what is second? "Humility;" and what is third? "Humility." Humility is emphatically the mind of Christ. A lady had been very much impressed by reading the works of a distinguished preacher in London. And when she was afterward a visitor in that city, on the first Sabbath she eagerly sought his church. But alas! what was her disappointment to find that the preacher in all his bearing reminded her every moment of the man in the Bible who exclaimed, "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built for the royal dwelling place, by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty?" It was several years before she got fa enough away from that vision to read again his books with profit. As teachers let us choose the gentleness and tenderness of Paul.

A young minister had been preaching two or three years, and he became discouraged. He came to the old minister and said: "I am much discouraged. I am about to give up. I don't know how to get along. I have been thundering away at the people for three years, trying to make them give up their sins, and they won't." "Ah," said the old minister, "my son in the Gospel, I will tell you what's the matter with you. You don't know how to fish. Now when a man goes a fishing, he selects a delicate pole, a delicate line, a delicate hook, a delicate fly. Then he gently drops it in the stream, and he pulls out a fish. But," said the old minister to the young minister, "my son in the Gospel, that is not the way you fish. When you go to fish, you take for a pole a weaver's beam; on it you fasten a cart-rope, and then you put on the end of it a pot hook, and you fasten on that a living scorpion; then you splash it into the

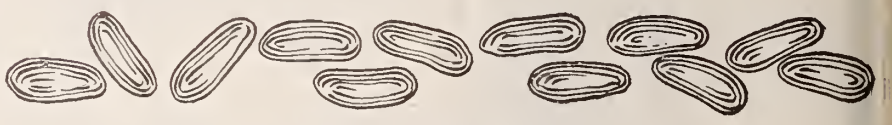
These Foods Are in Fashion This Summer



Puffed Rice—15c

Except in the Extreme West

Cereal foods, as you all know, are subject to fads and fashions. The favorites to-day are the foods shot from guns—the crisp, unique, delightful foods invented by Prof. Anderson.

We have to tease people to try these foods, because they are new and queer.

But wait till you try them. The folks at your table will do the teasing then.

For these are delightful foods. There never was anything like them.

Mammoth crisp grains, with their coats unbroken—so porous that they melt in the mouth.

Hearty foods, yet they don't tax the stomach. Every starch granule has been blasted to pieces, so the digestive juices act instantly.

Whatever you seek—healthfulness, heartiness or taste--no other cereals compare with them.

Prof. Anderson's Foods

You owe these foods to Prof. A. P. Anderson. And he owes them largely to accident.

He was seeking a way to break up starch granules so the digestive juices could get to them.

In cooking, baking or toasting, only part of the granules are broken. The aim of food experts has been to break all.

Prof. Anderson's idea was to explode them by steam. And the result, as expected, was to blast every granule to pieces. But he did not expect that this steam explosion would leave crisp and unbroken grains.

Exploded by Steam

In this curious process, the whole wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved, for sixty minutes, in a heat of 550 degrees. That heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes terrific.

Then the guns are unsealed—the steam explodes. Instantly every starch granule is blasted into a myriad particles.

The kernels of grain are expanded eight times—made four times as porous as bread. Yet the coats are unbroken, the shapes are unaltered. They are delightful, digestible foods.

A Package Will Tell

One ten-cent package of the Puffed Wheat will tell you how much these foods mean to you.

Order it now, and submit it to a vote of your table.

If the children say, "We want these foods always," let them have what they want. For never were cereal foods created so good for them as these.

Sold by grocers everywhere.

The First Trade School for Girls

BOSTON has taken the lead in the much-needed enterprise of a school where girls who wish to learn trades, or who wish to further perfect themselves in trades they are working in, can secure the desired instruction. The Boston school will be the first institution of its kind in the world.

Work upon the new building is already under way. Accommodations will be made for about three hundred pupils. A girl entering the school must be fourteen years of age or over. But to gain entrance she does not need to be a graduate of a grammar or elementary school. The idea of the Boston Trade School is to stand for its particular purpose absolutely, and if a girl is sincere in the desire to learn a trade she can come here and undertake its study, and practice running a sewing machine, including all the up-to-date styles of machines, and all their appliances for tucking, hemming, embroidering and the like. If she wants to be an expert in certain varieties of needlework she can come here and make herself an artist in the specialty, if she has the gift. If she wishes to be a cook in a restaurant or a hotel, she can come to the Boston Trade School, and go through a course that in a few weeks will give her more technical knowledge than she might get in a year of work. This is the invaluable idea of the establishment: To help poor girls become self-supporting in common trades. It is not a concern for fancy or artistic training, but one to aid the working girl.

The Women's Trade School, Boston

The course of study, while not fully worked out by the Boston School Board, will include training in dress making, millinery, clothing machine operating, straw machine, spelling, business forms, business English, textiles, industrial conditions, color study, designing, gymnastics, and cooking.

This splendid humanitarian institution is the outcome of a school which Miss Edith M. Howes established a few years ago, on Massachusetts Avenue, in Boston, as a private school for the training of poor young girls. Her enterprise was successful from the start. It received help and public notice until it has developed into a vital part of Boston's public school system. LIVINGSTON WRIGHT.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

stream and say, 'Bite.' Ah!" said the old minister, "you don't know how to fish." It is kindness and geniality that will bring men into the kingdom; you can't drive them in. And just as soon as we begin to learn that, we will begin to be useful all of us.

Look at this picture of gentleness in a hospital ward, with sick and wounded men lying on couches; a clock upon the wall, whose fingers point to an hour past midnight; in the forefront a gentle woman with a lamp in her hand, passing from bed to bed, all unconscious that the rough soldier behind her has risen on his elbow to kiss her shadow on the wall as she goes by. We verily believe those Ephesian elders were in the mood of kissing Paul's shadow that day they spent with him at Miletus.

Paul as a Faithful and Diligent Teacher

He reminded the elders how he had not only preached in public places—in the synagogue and in the hall of Tyrannus—but also that he had taught from house to house. It would be impossible to think that he had ever been absent from any place where it was expected that he would teach and preach. Can the same be said of us? "House-to-house visitation" is thought to be something quite modern in Sunday School work, but Paul knew all about it and did it!

Paul as a Fearless Teacher

He declared to the Ephesians that he had not shrunk from declaring unto them anything that was profitable. When one is sailing a boat it is quite the proper thing to trim the sails to the wind, but never morally is that the thing to do. A certain clergyman had in his church a member who drank liquor, but was not a drunkard. He was accustomed every day to have wine upon his dinner table. The minister announced a series of temperance sermons, and was warned by some of the other members that "he would drive Mr. F. out of the church, and that he had better take some other topic." But the minister was a man after Paul's stamp. He went right on with the temperance sermons. Mr. F. was in his pew Sunday after Sunday, and finally, when the series was finished, he sent for the minister to come to his home to dine with him. There was no wine on the table, and Mr. F. said: "I want you to know that your sermons have made a teetotaler out of me; and, furthermore, I want you to preach some of those same sermons to the hundreds of men I have in my employ."

Paul's Theme as a Teacher and Preacher

He declared to the Ephesians the Gospel of the grace of God in Christ Jesus. And so potent had it been that loads of books teaching sorcery and idol worship had been burned by their owners, who had been led to the worship of the true God by the words of Paul. And down through the ages no better theme has appeared, nor will appear in the ages to come.

Take heed! And then the apostle Paul uttered words of solemn warning to his Ephesian friends. He spoke as a dying man to dying men. The Lord Jesus had once spoken of his decease which should be accomplished at Jerusalem. And in a similar way Paul spoke of himself, knowing that bonds and afflictions awaited him. And he said to them, "Ye shall see my face no more." And then the good-by (God be with you) words were spoken by him; first, there were words of warning against false teachers, "grievous wolves," who would come among them and try to unsettle their members' belief in Christ as their Saviour; second, that in their very own household of faith some would themselves become false teachers. And then he showed them where the strength would be in combating these evil influences: "I commend you to God, and to the Word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you the inheritance among them that are sanctified." That was to be their shield and buckler. And he gave them a grand motto to live by: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Ten Years Ago This Man Was Laughed At

He was "turned down" by insurance companies: at forty he faced an early death. Today, at sixty-one, he holds the Yale record, over its own athletes, for tests of physical endurance. The leading doctors and scientists of America and Europe, who once scoffed at him, endorse him. We have all heard of "Fletcherism": but here is Horace Fletcher's own remarkable story of his discovery: how he built up his own health: HOW I HAVE KEPT MYSELF YOUNG AT SIXTY, and every man and woman can do it.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA

MESSINA AS IT IS TO-DAY

TO realize fully the terrible disaster which befell both Messina and Reggio one must visit the scene. A single glace will tell the whole story. It is hard to understand that in a moment, in fact in the twinkling of an eye, the cities, so fair and beautiful, were turned into cemeteries, for in the neighborhood of one hundred thousand people were entombed. It is a sad sight to the stranger to see wagonloads of common boxes, made, in many instances, of rough boards, taken from destroyed buildings and out-houses and converted into coffins, in the public streets, which in most cases are the only place of manufacture. The work is done as cheaply as possible, as the expense of excavation and burial is borne largely by the government, though some of it is being carried on by means of contributed funds. A zinc lining is furnished for the sum of forty lire to those who can afford to pay. The principal industry of the district seems to be excavating for bodies and making coffins in which to bury them again.

One can quickly become hardened to such distressing scenes. Although three to four hundred bodies are being taken daily from the ruins, the finding and the conveying of them through the cities seems to be of small concern to any one. The passing of wagonloads of bodies through the streets, on their way to the cemeteries, is hardly noticed except by visitors. Entire families were killed, and many who were spared have left the city. As far as I could observe, none of the houses, or buildings of any kind, are being rebuilt. Many buildings, wrecked in the upper part, shelter people in their first story, the latter having been made as tenantable as possible. In these the people are still living, and in many cases doing business, selling groceries, meats, vegetables and fruits.

The destruction of the business portion of the town along the wharf, and the streets known as Via Garibaldi and Via Victor Emmanuel, is complete. The Via Fossata is a rendezvous for the bodies from a certain district. Here they are placed in the rude coffins mentioned and then taken to the cemeteries. As you walk along the streets, which have been partly cleaned up, you notice depressions where the sidewalks and streets, after the earthquake, sank below their ordinary level. The wharf also has sunk, the piers running out on a slant, in many cases, toward the ocean. The landmarks and creations of the earlier days are gone forever.

Reggio is seven miles from Messina, across the Straits, and had a population of 47,000 persons, of whom 20,000 lost their lives. As you climb over these ruins you know that you are walking over the bodies of thousands of the unfortunate people who, but a few weeks before, were full of life and strength. The stench in the air at some places has become a serious menace to the health of those who were spared.

Conditions in Reggio are as bad as those at Messina. There are ruins on every side and the town seems to be in a demoralized state. The great distress and poverty are due as much to shiftlessness, indolence and natural inertness as to other causes. There does not seem to be any progress in the work of rebuilding, except in the construction of temporary places for the homeless refugees to live in. In all, it is a depressing scene, from which the visitor turns away with a sense of inexpressible sadness.

WILLIAM SLEICHER.

Evangelistic Notes

—THE NATIVE CHIEF of the town of Oyo, in Nigeria, Africa, who recently expelled the Rev. S. D. Pinnock, a missionary of the Foreign Missions Board of the South Baptist Convention, has now seized the land belonging to the Baptist Mission. The chief objection to Mr. Pinnock arose from the latter's protests regarding the chief's cruelty to his people.

—REV. JANEWAY GORDON, who has devoted several years to efforts in behalf of boys in Newark, N. J., and other cities, has established a summer school and camp for boys (which opened June 30) on the western slope of the Berkshire Hills, near Lebanon Springs, N. Y. A number of Christian workers assist in the work.

—MISSIONARY R. H. BENDER, of San Salvador, writes: "During April and May forty new members were received into the church by baptism and many new believers made confession of faith. In two small towns on the frontier, notorious for their robberies and murders in former years, the Gospel has made a complete transformation and now any one is perfectly safe to visit or remain there."

—A REMARKABLE Union Sunday School picnic took place lately at Dubuque, Ia. Between 6,000 and 7,000 persons attended, all the Protestant churches being represented. Rev. H. Ficke delivered the opening prayer. There were addresses, music, athletic games and a great parade, a feature of the latter being an ancient coach legended "1840-1909," in which rode five aged chartered members of the First Baptist Church, who have belonged to it constantly since 1840. Other leading personalities were Dr. C. J. Peterson, Mr. Frank M. Fitch, Rev. H. Ficke, B. M. Harger and Miss Anniette Streber.

—EVANGELIST ROBERT E. JOHNSON and workers have just returned from the Pacific Coast, where they have just conducted a successful series of union evangelistic meetings in Albany, Ore., under the auspices of the Laymen's Union of the churches of Albany. A special tabernacle was erected, seating about 2,500 people. The choir of over 200 voices was under the direction of Professor L. A. Wegner. People came from Portland and Salem, and other towns to attend the meetings. One of the telephone companies connected telephones over the city and some out-of-town lines with the tabernacle, thus enabling hundreds to hear who could not attend.

Meat vs. Beans

Compare two pounds of beans with two pounds of sirloin steak. The beans cost 15c, the steak 45c. Yet the meat contains less of nutriment.

Beans are 23% nitrogenous—84% nutriment. They contain more food than beef, or eggs, or cheese. Yet see how little they cost.

They are appetizing and hearty. All people like them. They should be a daily dish, not an occasional. They are our most economical, most staple food.

The trouble has been the home oven, where the center beans never get half heat enough.

The result is, the beans, instead of digesting, ferment and form gas. You call them a heavy food.

They are mushy, broken and uninviting, due to your lack of facilities.

Beans must be baked in a steam oven, at a heat of 245 degrees. They must be baked in small parcels, so the full heat goes through.

They should be baked without bursting, so they remain nutty, mealy and whole.

And the tomato sauce should be baked into the beans, to give a delicious blend.

That is the way we bake them. Then we send them to you ready to serve. A dozen cans mean a dozen meals, ready when you want them.

If you will simply learn what such beans mean you will never again go without them.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

But don't judge Van Camp's by other ready-baked beans.

We pay four times what some beans cost to get the whitest and plumpest of Michigan beans—picked out by hand.

We make our tomato sauce from whole, vine-ripened tomatoes, and it costs us five times what common sauce sells for.

The only way to get beans as good as they can be is to insist on Van Camp's.

THREE REASONS

Each with Two Legs and Ten Fingers.

A Boston woman who is a fond mother writes an amusing article about her experience feeding her boys.

Among other things she says: "Three chubby, rosy-cheeked boys, Bob, Jack and Dick, aged 6, 4 and 2 years respectively, are three of our reasons for using and recommending the food, Grape-Nuts, for these youngsters have been fed on Grape-Nuts since infancy, and often between meals when other children would have been given candy.

"I gave a package of Grape-Nuts to a neighbor whose 3 year old child was a weazened little thing, ill half the time. The little tot ate the Grape-Nuts and cream greedily and the mother continued the good work and it was not long before a truly wonderful change manifested itself in the child's face and body. The results were remarkable, even for Grape-Nuts.

"Both husband and I use Grape-Nuts every day and keep strong and well and have three of the finest, healthiest boys you can find in a day's march."

Many mothers instead of destroying the children's stomachs with candy and cake give the youngsters a handful of Grape-Nuts when they are begging for something in the way of sweets. The result is soon shown in greatly increased health, strength and mental activity.

Paul's Farewell at Ephesus

By Mrs. M. Baxter

A PASTOR who lives a life among his people is always highly valued by them. Jesus lived our life in all things: in the home, in the workshop, at the marriage feast, by the grave of Lazarus, there was Jesus. Never in the midst of worldly pageants, but in every circumstance of domestic life. And a pastor of our own day in whom Christ lives out his life is just as full of interest for his people, just as forgetful of self, for where Jesus is he cannot be hid.

Paul tells how he served the Lord "with all humility of mind, and with many tears and temptations [or trials] which befell me by the laying in wait of the Jews." True humility of mind is to know that God knows best, and does best. Paul saw God in all the annoying thwarting of his work by the unbelieving Jews, and he could rejoice in these "reproaches," "persecutions" and "distresses," for Christ's sake, for only so could "the power of Christ rest upon him" to remain unmoved while under them, or to be delivered out of them.

Nothing teaches a people so much as the life of their pastor. If they see that he sees the hand of God in all which occurs in his family, and in all his relations with other men, then they can believe in all which he teaches them about trusting God. Paul served the Lord also with tears and trials. He said, "I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you." "I dare not preach as you do," said a minister one day, "for if I did, I should lose half my salary." It was a poor reason for keeping back that which was profitable; surely God was equal to the charge of caring for his salary! Paul's teaching was "publicly, and from house to house." Public preaching without any close dealing with individual souls always becomes more or less theoretical. Nothing makes a teacher so practical as a real knowledge of the spiritual needs of his people, and this he can only get as he becomes acquainted with them individually. It was this personal acquaintance with them which he mentions to the Thessalonians, "We exhorted and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children." The burden of his teaching was "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." He had the same Gospel for all. And his Gospel was not a mere logical conclusion; he testified it as being himself a witness of it.

Paul's farewell charge to the elders of the Ephesian Church, gathered at Miletus, was truly in the power of the Holy Ghost. He knew the language of the Spirit, was "led by the Spirit," lived in the Spirit, walked in the Spirit, and prayed in the Holy Ghost. Consequently, we see him recognizing the Spirit in his own call to missionary life, in the way of guidance for his work and as the power for preaching. Oh that this were recognized, that neither man nor church, neither learning nor university degree, can make a man an overseer of the Church of God. It takes the Holy Ghost to do it. In the early Church a man did not choose his ministry as his profession; he was chosen of the Holy Ghost, and only ordained by man after being manifestly used by the Spirit. If the life of a pastor is not depending on God, his flock will fare badly. He may give eloquent, fervent discourses; the result of much talent, research and learning. But while the minds of his hearers are interested, informed and delighted, their souls will not be brought into the presence of God; the preacher will have impressed himself, and not his God, upon his people. This is not to feed the flock of God. The less a teacher is perceptible, the better. When God's people have really been fed, they do not come away from the service and talk about the preacher, but about the Lord.

In Touch With His World

He is in touch with his world.

The railroad president to-day spends the greater portion of the summer at his country home renewing his energy. He keeps in touch with his railroad system over the telephone.

He may be one hundred miles or more away from headquarters, yet his office and the principal business centers of the country are within talking distance.

He is notified immediately when anything important occurs; his advice and direction are asked and given over the telephone; the machinery of the road goes on.

Each day, at the noon hour or in the early morning or late afternoon, he conducts his business over the long distance line.

Through the day he has been renewing his energy—sailing, driving, or playing golf—making himself more fit for the busier season and able at all times to handle a larger system and a larger volume of business than the president of two decades ago.

This is simply an illustration which applies to every busy man, whether he be railroad president, merchant, manufacturer or professional man.

It shows the importance of universal service, which is the constant aim of the Associated Bell Companies—of one system, extending to every nook and corner of the United States, keeping all localities within speaking distance of one another.

Long Distance Bell Service is universal in two ways—in its extension to all localities and in its application to all human activities. Whatever your interests, it will advance them economically, certainly, constantly.

For mine is the old belief,
That midst your sweets and your bloom of flowers,
There's a soul in every leaf!"

R., Independence, Kan. 1. Does it require two cents to carry a letter from the United States to Germany? 2. How often do letters leave the United States for Germany? How often received into the United States from Germany?

1. If five cents are paid, the letter leaves by the first steamer, often going by way of England. If a two-cent stamp is appended, it has to wait for a steamer sailing direct to a German port, usually a slower ship. 2. Mails are sent and received from Germany at least twice a week, and sometimes oftener.

Subscriber, Tallahassee, Fla. What are the land holdings of the Union Pacific? Is it true, as reported, that it proposes to sell its lands?

Mr. Charles E. Wantland, general land agent of the road, recently stated that it owned 19,400,000 acres, exclusive of its right of way. The railroads in the Harriman system altogether hold 52,307,840 acres, or about 81,731 square miles. We know nothing about the plans of the railroads.

T. M. J., Osceola, Mo. 1. Explain Judges 1:19. 2. How many Buddhists are there? 3. At what time, and from what nation, did the Jews get the idea of the immortality of the soul?

1. It should read, to be quite clearly understood: "And Judah drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; hut he could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley," etc. The Lord did greatly aid the arms of Judah, but this was no doubt a case where the faith of Judah and his men was weak, in view of the strength of the enemy. 2. Estimated at 147,000,000 throughout the world. 3. From their earliest beginnings as a nation they apparently held the helief in immortality. Moses spoke of the tree of life in Paradise; God was the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Ex. 3:6), of the continuously living, not of the dead. The Egyptians, among whom the Israelites served, from the remotest times believed in immortality, and the belief must have been communicated to the Israelites. Further, the Jewish laws against necromancy and tbe invocation of the dead show this belief. See Deut. 18:9, 12; I. Sam. 28; Ps. 106:28, and other passages. See also Gen. 5:22, 24; Gen. 37:35; Gen. 47:9 (interpreted by Paul in Heb. 11:13-16); Matt. 22:23; Isa. 14:9; Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2, and others. After the Babylonian captivity, the belief in immortality took more definite form, and at the time of Christ it was universally received and taught by the Pharisees. Josephus, Philo and Tacitus refer to it.

O. T., Palmetto, Ga. Please explain Matt. 24:35 and Luke 21:33.

It was the strongest possible expression of the divine authority by which he spoke. Such language would be altogether out of place in the mouth of a mere human being, even though he were a Moses or a Paul. It was a declaration of his own divinity.

Rev. Ira M. Grey, pastor of Emmanuel Congregational Church, Chicago, Ill., writes: I have just read the editorial which appears in the latest issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, entitled "The New Religion," and wish to take this opportunity to thank you for the fearless and able defense of the Gospel made therein. It is both timely and reassuring, and, in view of the wide publicity given to Dr. Eliot's utterances by the daily press, should prove a blessing to thousands whose minds may have been poisoned by the reading of these published vagaries."

Our correspondent's letter reminds us that Dr. Eliot's address is still a leading topic in the religious press. It is interesting to note the various comments on his "New Religion." One journal declares that it has "no vital elements . . . and nothing actually new." Dr. Buckley, in The Christian Advocate, says Dr. Eliot, instead of a real religion, has evolved "a fog of uncertainty, a mist of unreliability, and clouds of instability." "Pantheism," says The Congregationalist. It has "no remedy for sin and does not recognize such a thing as sin," observes The Presbyterian; and The Church Advocate, of Harrisburg, Pa., squarely and logically hits the mark when it says "a religion without authority would be a religion without obedience." Which is tantamount to saying that it is no religion at all.

N. S., St. Johns, N. F. What is the translation of the word "giaour," the word used in referring to non-Mohammedans in recent articles on Turkey? How is it pronounced?

"Giaour" means, in Turkish, an unheliever in the Mohammedan faith, an infidel. It is pronounced jow-er.

Mina V. D., Passaic, N. J. I am greatly interested in the war on the "white slave traffic." What countries are interesting themselves in the movement?

There are now fifteen governments united in the crusade to crush out the infamous traffic, viz.: Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Switzerland, Portugal, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Norway, Canada and Australia. These governments undertake to guard the railroad depots and shipping ports, and to take action against any persons who are found to he engaged in the traffic. They also agree to care for and shelter the victims who are rescued and to return them to their homes or send them to some safe destination.

A. B. J., Cisco, Tex. Tell me the name of the room in the Capitol at Washington, D. C., where stand the statues of Frances E. Willard and other famous citizens of this republic. I have been under the mistaken impression that it was called the Hall of Fame.

The statue of Miss Willard stands in Statuary Hall in the national Capitol. It was once used as the Hall of Representatives. Each State is entitled to send two statues. The Hall of Fame is at New York University, New York City. It contains no statues, only tablets.

E. H. N., Bluffton, O. 1. How long did Adam and Eve live after they were sent out of Eden? 2. Did Jesus have any brothers? 3. Is it right to go to battle?

1. It is not known how long Adam and Eve dwelt in Paradise. Some think many years, others a much shorter period. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says Adam was 230 years old at the time of Abel's death, and that he lived 700 years longer. 2. See Matt. 12:46, John 2:12, Acts 1:14, Gal. 1:19. These brethren were regarded hy the early Church fathers as mere relatives, or, more exactly, cousins—the sons of Mary, the sister of Jesus' mother. As the names of James and Joses appear among the sons of the other Mary (Matt. 27:56) there is no evidence that Jesus had any full brother. 3. It is not right to go to war. No principle is settled by violence, and no war is justifiable save in defense against unjustifiable aggression.

Reader, Rushville, N. Y. When and by whom was the Tower of London founded?

Tradition says that Julius Cæsar founded a citadel where the tower now stands, in 54 B.C. William the Conqueror, in 1076 A.D., built a palace on the spot, and many additions were subsequently made to it.

Victor B., Villesca, Ia. 1. Explain Heb. 10:26. 2. What became of Aaron's rod after his death?

1. Presumptuous sin, i. e., sin done deliberately after enlightenment, is not the result of ignorance or error, hut a wilful rejection of Christ's sacrifice, and is doubly deserving of condemnation. Paul was warning the Church that if there was no diligence in spiritual progress, there would be lukewarmness and sin. 2. Aaron's rod was laid up as a memorial in the holy place (see Num. 17:8-10 and Heb. 9:4).

Reader, Navarre, Kan. What is the meaning of I. Cor. 11:15?

This verse should he read in connection with verses 5, 6 and 7 of the same chapter. Paul's letter was intended to administer a reproof to the Corinthians for allowing themselves to fall in with a style of manners which confused the distinction of the sexes and threatened to have a bad influence on morals. He no doubt intended to rebuke the women of his day for the pride they displayed in the matter of headdress decoration.

Mrs. J. B. G., Peace Dale, R. I. Please explain John 21:18.

It is explained in the next verse, and foreshadowed the manner of Peter's martyrdom, which was by crucifixion.

C. P. M., Lake City, Fla. Please explain Ex. 22:29.

The first clause of the verse relates to the annual offering of the first fruits; the second, to the sanctification of the first-born sons of every Hebrew household to the Lord, as a sort of priesthood belonging to the eldest sons, and also in commemoration of the preservation of Israel when the first-born sons of Egypt were smitten.

T. M. W., Shenandoah Junction, W. Va. See Matt. 13:24-30, inclusive; also verses 37, 38, 39. Does this parable refer to the world or the Church?

It referred to the mixed character of the Kingdom in its present state and the final, absolute separation of the two classes. Jesus describes in his explanation (verses 36 to 43) the conflict between good and evil.

Mrs. A. A. R., Ipswich, S. Dak. Please explain Matt. 23:15.

This was in a discourse against hypocrisy, and the passage in question pointed out that the proselyte from heathenism to Judaism was doubly condemned: by the religion he had left and that which he embraced, since the latter was as false and hollow as the first, as Jesus had already shown in the earlier part of the discourse. See Rom. 6, Gal. 5:4 for light on your second question.

M. C., Pottstown, Pa. Why are government reports called "blue books"?

They are so called on account of the color of the covers. The idea was taken from the reports, etc., of the British Parliament, which are called "blue books" on account of the color in which they are bound.

M. A. McD., Duhuque, Ia. What is the status of the medical profession in China?

Western medical methods are making considerable progress in certain parts of China, but the native school of medicine is ignorant and antiquated. This is a description of the average native doctor, from the North China Mail: "He determines the treatment by feeling the pulse alone, and says there are several pulses to each arm and many variations to each pulse. . . . All the pulses may vary at the same time. . . . His medical doses are from 30 to 40 pills each, and from a pint to a quart of liquid medicine, usually of a disgusting nature. Surgery is unknown, and unsightly plasters of pitch are used upon all wounds and sores." It is not surprising, under these conditions, that there should be few recoveries.

Department Store Employees at Lunch on a Roof-Garden

NOON at the big department stores in our large cities is an interesting period of the day. Many of these great emporiums have restaurants specially fitted up for the employees. In one Philadelphia establishment, roof-gardens have been laid out, and the girls and men eat their noon meal there at a restaurant provided by the firm. At shaded tables they can sit and eat their own lunches or order from the firm's bill of fare. Everything in the edible line is provided at cost: large plates of ice cream five cents, milk two cents a glass, coffee or tea three cents, sandwiches four cents, and fruit in proportion. The roof-garden has been made more inviting by the addition of flower beds, big awninged spaces, hammocks, comfortable rockers and a phonograph for the amusement of those who eat or rest during the noon interval.

GLEANERS AT WORK IN THE BARLEY FIELDS ALONG THE LINE OF THE BAGDAD RAILWAY

MAKING THE ANCIENT EAST TO BLOSSOM

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

EVENTS in Turkey have some consequences that do not appear on the surface. In the struggle between Young Turk and Old Turk to control the Moslem empire, attention is given chiefly to the political and religious results, but the programme of the Young Turks includes also much that makes for material progress and the welfare of great masses of population.

A part of their plan is to feed the people, and possibly to populate Mesopotamia as it was populated in Biblical times. One of the first measures taken after the overthrow of the Sultan Abdul was to provide for an expedition to the regions of the Tigris and Euphrates and the lands bordering the Persian Gulf. The object was to determine how far the modern science of irrigation could restore the conditions which the ancient science of irrigation, as practised by the Chaldeans, the Babylonians and the Assyrians, had created some thousands of years ago.

The enterprise was placed in charge of Sir William Willcocks, an eminent English engineer. He has been for years in charge of irrigation works in Egypt, and to his initiative and energy was due much for the work accomplished in restoring to Egypt the fertility which marked the times of the Pharaohs and their predecessors. Under his direction many of the most important dams and canals of the Nile were built, and the fellaheen, or laboring population, were given means of subsistence which have raised them far above their condition of thirty years ago.

Sir William Willcocks had studied not only the land of Egypt, but the land of the Chaldeans. He had made deep investigations into the systems of four thousand years ago which prevailed in the region between the Tigris and the Euphrates, and had satisfied himself both as to the causes of the disaster which had swept away the old canals and as to the means which might be taken in the twentieth century to restore the ancient fertility. Some of his plans, perhaps, could only be understood by irrigation engineers in their technical details, but it is not necessary to be an engineer to share his enthusiasm over the prospect of repeopling this region, which is now marsh and sandy desert, and of again making it blossom with life-giving crops.

The region comprises the district between the Euphrates and the Tigris, with its sand and swamps and its blistering sun. This was the country described as "the dry and thirsty land, where no water is." In other sections it could be said that "the land drinketh water of the rain of heaven," but here the rain of heaven never fell. Yet a part of this region came within the boundaries of the plain of Edin, or Eden. It was the artificial means of watering it that produced the fertility. The Chaldeans were canal builders. The great Nahrawan and the Kerez Sandih Canal dated from this epoch. And Sennacherib, the Assyrian, and Nebuchadnezzar II. were canal builders.

Professor Sayce of Oxford has given it as his belief that the irrigation works of this region were before those of Egypt. It is also the belief of eminent investigators that the wild wheat from which came the grain that to-day is so vital to the nourishment of the world's population first grew in this region. The Babylonian temple archives give an idea of the agriculture that was practised in that epoch, mentioning also how barley was brought in for the support of the temple servants. One tablet reads:

Ninety-five gur, 150 qa of ikbid seed of the full tax due to Irimshu-Nimib, to be paid to Bunna-Nimib, son of Innibi. The barley he shall pay to Irimshu-Nimib, when he shall break the seal.

That wheat and barley and rice can be grown again, if a system of irrigation can be established, is unquestioned. The area capable of irrigation in upper and lower Chaldea, that is, the plain between the Tigris and the Euphrates, is about 18,000 square miles. In the delta there are 5,000,000 acres, and in the vicinity of Bagdad 1,300,000 acres. This land to-day is worthless. The estimate is that it can be made worth $150 per acre at an actual cost of a few dollars per acre.

At the present time such irrigation as exists is confined to the headwaters of the Persian Gulf, and is tidal, or back-water, irrigation. Magnificent date palms are found wherever the tidal irrigation obtains. These dates are sought for as the choicest delicacies all over the world. They are the chief food of the Arabs, and evidently are a nutritious food, for the Arabs of this district are noted for their splendid physique.

The Sultan Abdul before his deposition had begun some irrigating works, chiefly to restore the fertility of the Babylonian rice lands. He monopolized a vast tract, and employed French engineers to carry out the plans. These were progressing favorably when he was deposed. Probably the Young Turks will sequestrate this property as belonging to the empire, and will continue the irrigating works that had been planned.

A very important factor in Sir William Willcocks' proposed irrigating works is to utilize the railways that he hopes to see constructed. The canals would not interfere with railway building, but railroads are essential if population is to be secured and the products of the irrigated lands are to be made available for commerce. The main reliance is, of course, the Bagdad railway, which it is hoped some day will join Constantinople and Smyrna with the Persian Gulf. It will also join Damascus, though the ancient caravan route from Damascus through Palmyra will not be restored, since

The Christian's Call to Service

TEXT—Luke 22 : 32

When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren

EVERYTHING of real value has at some time, or in some place, an opportunity to prove its worth. If conversion is a real thing, it must prove its reality by its effect for good upon others. A mere profession of a fact or occurrence in one's life is not sufficient to prove its reality either to ourselves or to others. Peter was full of confession and profession, as may be observed by a mere glance at the context. He boasted of his allegiance to his Lord with great emphasis, saying, "Though all others forsake thee, yet will not I." Yet all this well-sounding and well-meant profession only helped to reveal how weak he was when, a little later, the point of a girl's finger wilted his profession and turned it into open denial of Christ. Whatever Peter had up to this time cannot be put on the world's market as a sure cure for weakness. Whatever came into his life between his denial of his and our Lord and Pentecost, and what follows, which made him a moral giant in less than two months, is the thing that every soul will pay well to get. The very thought of Peter, as we read his sermon in Acts, second chapter, fires our souls with holy zeal. His compassion on the poor man at the gate Beautiful, in chapter three, puts new strength into our withered members and new praises on our lips. His imprisonment and trial, in Acts 4, makes every wronged person feel that Peter was truly a rock of strength.

What Conversion Means

His whole life is now effectively spent in strengthening people. Even to-day, after all these years have passed away, Christian missionaries and workers in all the world are being strengthened by Peter. Really it seems that he is more of an apostle of strength to-day than ever. As we read the Scripture, are we really justified in taking the text literally, connecting all the power of Peter in the world to-day with all the weakness displayed by him in the court of the high priest's house? Is it possible that the little switch called "Conversion" transformed an empty, rattling train, with broken engine, into one so heavily laden and so strong that twenty centuries have only enabled a poor, weak, troubled world to barely taste of its yet exhaustless supply of strength? Yes! It is all true, as can be testified to by an almost countless host of the redeemed now in the world, as also the larger number of witnesses beyond the vale, who have partaken of the strength of God, conveyed to them by Peter, and who in turn, like him, are communicating strength to others. Whatever the word "conversion" may mean technically or theologically, any person can understand that in a small compass of time and space Peter became disconnected with the elements of weakness and became attached to a certain power, which has never yet become exhausted. We may with profit meditate seriously upon some of the things from which Peter was converted and the things to which he was converted, and the practical proof of the reality of the change.

Sinking Self and Exalting Christ

I. Converted from self to another. One of the closest and best followers Jesus had was Peter. He was one of the special band of three, the others being James and John. In the Mount of Transfiguration they had been with him. They had also been in the garden of Gethsemane. They had performed miracles, taught the people, and received with appreciation the words that fell from the Saviour's lips. They had accepted the invitation and command to follow Christ, and for three years they were the best and most trusted followers he had; but Peter had never lost sight of himself in all this experience. No one could admire the Lord more than he, and no one was more devoted, yet all he did and said was weak because of his conscious self. He exalted the Saviour only in relation to himself. It was Peter, Peter doing it all. The people saw this, and felt and remained in their weakness. When, however, the last cords of personal admiration were cut and the elements of personal pride and conceit were eliminated, Peter sunk so far behind the horizon of another personality, even that of Jesus, the Son of God, that the world saw no more of the old Peter, but of Christ. Although he retained his name, he became as a glass through which people saw God. He became as a pipe, through which ran streams of heavenly influence. No matter how closely he followed the Lord; no matter what his profession or his theology; no matter how humble or courageous, or eloquent, or good he was, so long as the big personal pronoun "I" stood at the top he could not strengthen anybody. He could do everything else but strengthen people. This he could not do, for all power belongs unto Christ, and the highest office Peter or any person can hold is a subjective one. The personality of Peter must be converted to a secondary place, and Christ must be as a person, put first. Then and then only, through the personal life of the agent Peter, can the strength of the omnipotent Christ come into the weakness of the brethren.

Christ Must Come First

This is the last element in man to be converted, and without this no phase of the truth of conversion means anything. To this all other gifts and talents are related. A man may be converted to the church and become a member; converted to the minister, and support him; converted to all the branches of church activity, and give to them; to any one of the denominations and hold tenaciously to all the doctrines back of it; but if he is not once and forever converted to the personal and everliving, omnipotent Saviour, he is a stumbling-block and an agent of weakness rather than strength. If pastors will take this into consideration they will understand why so many of their members, under the clear light of God's work, presented by a new voice, profess conversion to Jesus Christ and begin a life of real service. When people are thus converted, they immediately begin to go out after weak persons and impart strength to them. We have had a very humble volunteer worker in our service now for the past seven years, who is a tower of strength to us all. Forty years ago he came from Londonderry, Ireland, where he had joined the church and was brought up in the Sabbath School, a faithful attendant upon all the church duties, for duties they were and nothing more. He showed me his church letter, signed by his pastor, and showing him in good standing. He has been in America for forty years. Church bells have rung every Sunday all about him. Occasionally he would drop in and hear a sermon, but never took his church letter from the covers of the old Bible to deposit it with God's people. Seven years ago he heard a simple sermon in the open air, and was impressed with the idea of a real personal Saviour for men. The next Sunday he came closer, and the next Sunday he was converted from his weak personal but religious self to a real mighty and personal Saviour. He immediately became vitally connected with the church and, although a man of limited means and modest gifts, there is not a man who knows him in our work who does not receive real substantial strength. What is it? Henry is converted to Christ, and Christ's life and character manifests itself through him and to the people, who know it to be the real thing because they are strengthened.

Included in the idea of conversion are all other elements to strengthen weak people. In order to be more explicit, I shall mention the following:

Temper as a Stumbling-Block

II. The converted temper. Peter was one of those impulsive, impetuous, quick-tempered people. He blurted out an oath without thinking about it. When he was good he was so sweet-tempered that everybody loved him and felt his influence for good, but when under pressure and force of opposing circumstances he so quickly broke and flew into a rage that no soul would believe him even a nominal Christian. But there came into his life a new temper, that no power on earth could break. When he was preaching, as seen in Acts 2:13, 14, the people mocked and told him he was drunk, but it did not even excite him. He simply and quietly said it was not so, but that it was the fulfilment of a promise of God in Joel that they saw him. When, in Acts 4, he was put in jail, he did not make any special fuss or demand his rights, but stood as quietly as a mountain in their midst and simply told the magistrate that all he did to convert three thousand people to God and to give new legs to that poor beggar at the gate was simply to exalt the name of Jesus. He had such a reserve fund of God's patience that no disgrace, no cutting word or deed could disturb the placidity of his soul as it rested in God. I have met a good many church leaders and prominent preachers in the past ten years who are wondering why the restless and uncertain crowd of ill-tempered people don't do better. I have seen these same men, on the slightest provocation, get mad and pout around like silly little children. Their dignity has been touched, or they are not paid enough salary, or one of many other little things too silly and childish to mention. I saw one leader order a good Christian woman from his office, and he never would allow her in any Christian work, simply because she was right and he was wrong. I saw another very prominent man get up, take his hat and go home, as mad as mad could be, because he did not like one man who happened to be in the meeting. I saw a Moderator of the General Assembly get up and stamp the floor as he walked out before a large audience. Why? An evangelist had said something which was perfectly true, but he did not like it. Mothers will sometimes abuse their weak little children in a heat of anger, and then ask the minister to pray for their ill-natured child. Say, listen, "O Spirit of God, say it to us all." "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren."

The Transformed Tongue

III. A converted tongue. Even the apostle James despaired of being able to turn into useful service or bridle into subjection this little member that was conquered in Peter. It was the very same tongue that cut the cords, yet it was this very thing, of half-believing, doubting, fearing followers of Christ when Peter said, "I am not," denying ever having known the Lord. This very tongue that lied and swore was converted into a tongue of fire and love and strength. The clearest and sweetest messages of God that ever passed over any tongue passed over Peter's. Every word he says throughout the Acts of the Apostles is a word of strength. Converted? Why, any child can see the change. Scholars and scientists only befog our minds here; this is too practical and too near at home for any to be deceived as to its meaning. Only think of the power of a word to set a wrong right; to turn the footsteps of a boy toward or from God; to encourage a worker whose burden is breaking him; to cheer a poor sick friend, who has lost courage; to arrest the footsteps of a young man in the doorway of some temptation; to make old saints feel they are of some use in the world; to encourage some poor preacher who is doing his best to put the world right, but who has little thanks and no salary. Did you ever stop to think what good you can do in a single day with that little tongue of yours converted? One of my associates said to another, as he came into the office one day, "I would rather be in jail than have your job." Did such a remark as that strengthen his Christian brother? No indeed!

Some way I feel that when Peter and the other followers were converted and received the gift of tongues, it was not so much a world power of languages put temporarily upon the tips of converted tongues as it was the enduement of one single heavenly language of love and power and fire at the base of the tongue which made its power felt so forcibly to the very tip of the tongue in such a way that every one understood in his own language. It is simply wonderful how quickly foreigners will understand a person whose tongue is converted. Do you mean to say you cannot speak of Christ to your own children, your Sunday School class or your neighbors? Is it possible that preachers even will lament their inability to reach the neighborhood in which their lot is cast? Will you, my brother, go to the mountains this summer and worry and rest and study sermons to please your handful of supporters, and leave the crowds about your church without Christ? Mr. Layman, are you in Europe, or at the shore, or in a committee meeting with others pondering the practical problem of making your pastor and church a great success? Will we all not do well to close our ears to every suggestion of the world and examine ourselves as to the work to which our tongues are devoted? Can you not

WALL STREET WELCOMES THE GOSPEL

FOR five years the Tent Campaign in New York City has done its work. During four of the five Rev. William Wilkinson preached for it daily, five days a week. On May 1 he began his work as special preacher for Trinity parish. The Rev. Dr. Manning and the vestry being anxious to enlarge its downtown work, Mr. Wilkinson on May 1 began a series of services at noon in Wall Street and Nassau, in sight of the Washington statue, and these were held each business day till the Campaign Committee began its work. Then, by mutual arrangement, Dr. Wilkinson held his services at the United States Custom House, while the committee took up the Wall Street meetings until its season closed, when they were resumed by Dr. Wilkinson. At the regular noonday service the audience of business men give most reverent attention to the proceedings. At the prayers all take off their hats, and stand quite still. Passersby observe this, and fall in with the throng. They listen earnestly to the black-gowned preacher, and follow Dr. Wilkinson in reciting the Apostles' Creed. The meetings are essentially religious. The preacher points his hearers to the person, talk, work and plans of Jesus. He does it all without cant, with no fear and no flattering of the rich or the poor. Plain, honest preaching is the order of the day. One day Mr. Wilkinson said: "It hath been said Jesus lost his temper sometimes when condemning the rich, the influential, the Pharisees, the scribes. Not at all. Jesus is never seen to better advantage than at these times. He was simply, honestly, unaffectedly faithful. Jesus told these folks the truth about themselves—which they ought to know—truth only he would tell them. What did he say? Why, this: 'You are not what you want men to think you are. You love high places in the synagogue and at feasts. You rob widows and the fatherless. You make long prayers. You would, if you could, cheat God Almighty. On the outside you are adorned; inwardly, you are vile. If you do not repent and do works meet for repentance, you shall not escape the damnation.' All Jesus said of these people and to these people they deserved. And all he said should be repeated to like people now. And, at least so far as I am concerned, it will be. A world teacher, such as we are told Jesus is, who let great people and great sinners go with no rebuke, is impossible. The world needs to hear the old, majestic tones in which all true prophets have thundered forth the law of righteousness. Jesus was just to the poor; kind, considerate, ever helpful; he knew man had a stomach as well as a soul, a body as well as a mind, and that all parts of the man needed looking after. Read St. Mark if you would understand this and have it engraved upon your hearts. Jesus knew man is a sinner; he did not require the pictures in the morning papers of joy rides, burglaries and the abominable divorce proceedings to tell him this fact, that sin is a real, an awful thing. It was ever before him, as before no child of man. This because of his perfect knowledge, of his perfect purity and love. Alas! how often is this forgotten as the qualification of Jesus for preaching, talking to and dealing with sinners. 'The Lord is just and righteous, therefore he will teach transgressors in the way that they should go.'

Mr. Wilkinson Preaching in Wall Street

"There is a profound reason for the imperative, 'Be clean that bear the vessels of the Lord.' It is not for a man who soaks himself with whisky to lecture men on sobriety, not for an unclean man to preach purity. Jesus appealed to those who knew him well: 'Which of you convinceth me of sin?' It was these qualities of eternal knowledge and purity, cast into the glowing fire of a sacred love for all the family of man, which gave to the words of Jesus to sinners such a charm and such a world-wide appreciation. They are fenced in by no State, national or party lines; no age, race, time, or condition of men can circumscribe them. Dramatic in plainness, picturesque in attractiveness, they stand solitary and with no competitors in their own line. The most powerful name on earth is that of Jesus. It is growing in power each and every day."

The downtown meetings are attended by captains who know every sea, and men and women of all conditions. It is the "old-time religion" in modern dress. Men see the day of Jesus and are glad.

At St. John's parish open-air services also are held, and Mr. Wilkinson has large attendances. Trinity parish is setting great churches an example in mission work, and its open-air services are proving of vast influence.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CALL TO SERVICE

possibly speak to the one who needs the Gospel message? One of our laymen insisted that he could not speak in public, but one night I called upon him and his tongue became converted and he spoke with such eloquence and power that the next day another layman, suffering from the same feeling of timidity, said to the first, "I would give a thousand dollars if I could talk as you did." The tongue is a perfectly innocent little thing, and it performs the work to which it is converted. If devoted to gossip, it will gossip; if it is converted to business, it will talk business; if converted to politics, life insurance, slander, flattery, or anything else, it will do that work faithfully. It is wholly subject to the power that controls it. If it is converted to tell of God and his love and purity and heaven, with all the powers of sainted mothers and Holy Spirit back of it, don't you suppose it will quickly tell the world of Christ and his might to strengthen?

IV. A converted pocketbook. One of Peter's converts to God was Barnabas, a very rich man. The last verse of Acts 4 says of him: "Having land he sold it, and brought the money and laid it at the apostle's feet." This was no momentary impulse, for we see considerable of Barnabas in the book of Acts, and he is always doing good and filled with the Holy Spirit. Barnabas did not wait for a collection basket, or a committee to call on him, or a special dinner in his honor; he simply proved he was converted, and brought his money to the treasurer. He did not even stipulate the particular work to which it must be devoted. He simply wanted to put his life, money and all into the thing that meant everything to him. It was his life pouring itself out to others, that they might be strengthened. It was his practical proof to himself and God and the world that he was converted. In the work with which I am associated the policy of no collection baskets has prevailed. This has not been strictly adhered to in church meetings, but in tents and open-air it has grown in favor with God and men as a policy. It has at least emphasized an apostolic principle, from which the Christian Church of today has gone far astray. Peter, being converted in this matter as in other matters, said in Acts 3:6 that he had something to give, and what he had to give was far better than silver and gold. He did not go to the world to get money, although they evidently needed it. He first aimed at the conversion of the people. It always followed that when a man of means was converted he gave his money. I have never in ten years seen even poor people converted who did not want immediately to give money. Ask yourself what it is that has strengthened you most. Has it been a mere building, a tower, a university, a monument, a library, or a prayer, a kind word, a hand-shake, a simple message from mother's lips, or a Sunday School teacher or missionary? Has it not been, in most cases, the individual touch of some one in whom you had confidence? Then why not give your money to that which strengthens most? One simple, true Christian missionary will strengthen people more than any other agency. Then why not multiply the missionaries not only abroad, but in our cities and country? New York needs one thousand missionaries before she needs another church, art gallery or library. Very few people give largely to purely spiritual work, yet all acknowledge that strength has come and comes to them, from spiritual sources. We are simply killing the life of our churches and not getting much either as compared to what we should get, simply because we have given ourselves to begging. We allow men to deceive us and themselves by a mere pittance when the collection basket is passed. If you will take away this temptation to hypocrisy, and preach for conversions, you will find men will come forward and give according to their means. Conversion to God is not mere acquiescence or sympathy, but downright giving, and that with sufficient conviction to enable the giver to walk up to the properly appointed receivers and place his gift in their hands. One well-to-do lady always gives 50 cents per year, in two payments, to all of her church activities. This is collected by a church worker. After every 25 cents she remarks, "I wish it were more, but I cannot afford it." This same lady belongs to three euchre parties, to each of which she gives 30 cents a week, making in all 90 cents. To this item alone she gives $46.80 per year, and 50 cents for Christ and his kingdom; and she is a professing Christian. By reversing this, and placing Christ in the euchre party account, she will strengthen people, and not until then.

Only think of the many practical subjects our text suggests, any one of which would make a twenty-minute sermon such as would fill a lifetime with helpful service. For example: A converted imagination; a converted voice to sing; a converted hand to uplift the fallen; a converted ear to hear God's voice; a converted eye to see the will of God; converted feet to walk in the path of righteousness; a converted life, perhaps from a selfish aim to that of helping people. There is not an avenue of your being through which God cannot pour out that which will give new life and hope and cheer, and love and courage, into people who are now discouraged, hopeless and lonely. We cannot take a step in the crowded city, or go far into the country, without seeing opportunities and hearing calls for help! help! We can, if converted to the ever-living Christ, give them that help in thousands of ways. It is not in the first instance more preparation we need, such as reading of sermons, study, etc., but a simple transferring of that faculty or faculties which we have to the risen Christ.

Mary Kelhower is a very poor woman, living all alone near South Front Street, Philadelphia, Pa. She keeps a little store in one room, selling a few crackers and candies to the neighbors, all of whom know and love her, irrespective of creed or race. One year ago her brother Samuel died, leaving her the last of a large family. With almost no money and few gifts, she has placed them all in the Saviour's hands. In her little store every week some forty children gather for their regular endeavor meeting. As she goes through the streets the children cling to her clothes. Last Saturday she gathered three streetcar-loads of one hundred each of the poorest of the poor, weakest and sickliest children in the city. She saw to it that every child had a tag with address upon it, which insured mothers of the safe return of the little objects of their love. She asked other volunteer leaders to help her on the cars. At 12:30 they all started for a half-day's outing in the park. Over three hundred children were made happy and blessed. Their mothers were rested, cheered and strengthened. The children were all taught a verse from God's Word and a good song of cheer, besides romping, swinging, eating ice-cream, etc., all due to one little woman. Near evening, I took the little woman by the hand and thanked her and God for the sermon she had preached to me, as well as the three hundred children and the homes represented. No ten ministers did more that day. No college or university contributed more strength and power in an equal length of time to an equal number of people. We asked her how she did it. "Oh," she replied, "this was just what brother Sam would have done, so I undertook it, and he has strengthened me." Yes, it was what her Elder Brother, Christ, and our Saviour would have done were he here, and as we are converted to his spirit, his ideas, his personality, we will do the same, and the world will become stronger through our efforts.

Building the Cape-to-Cairo Railroad

The Old Method of Transportation

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S announcement to Bishop Tucker, of Uganda, that he purposes visiting that country in December is especially interesting, because he expresses his anxiety to see something of the missionary work which has been so successful in that section of equatorial Africa. He is likely to find his expectations more than fulfilled, for only those who actually visit Uganda can realize the great development in a single generation, since Henry Morton Stanley, the heroic young Christian engineer Mackay, and the martyred Bishop Hannington were in that region. Mr. Roosevelt will see in Uganda a fully constituted native church, where only thirty years ago heathenism in its most cruel form reigned supreme. The Synod of that church of Uganda has sent him a cordial resolution of welcome. When he arrives at Mengo, the capital, he will find a large and beautiful new cathedral, capable of seating 5,000 people; also a splendidly equipped hospital, and other institutions.

All Central Africa may now very soon be accessible to people other than ex-Presidents and hunters and travelers. We may be able, if we wish, much sooner than Cecil Rhodes anticipated, to pass from the Cape to Cairo by rail; and then, for the missionary, many a longed-for opening will be available. In great strides this railway is advancing, and before the coming winter another chapter in the romance of African development will have opened.

Southward from Cairo the line now extends for 1,400 miles, having arrived at a point nearly 60 miles below Khartoum. El Obeid, in Kordofan, a famous rendezvous for caravans, is the objective for this first section. Probably El Obeid will in the near future displace Omdurman as the centre of the gum trade. Not less striking has been the march of the Cape section. Last February, the terminus was at Broken Hill, or no higher than the point reached in 1907; but by the end of October the extension to the Congo Free State frontier will have been reached. Then it will be time to consider projects for carrying the line to the shores of Lake Tanganyika and across the equator.

When Cecil Rhodes first propounded the idea of a great world-highway from Alexandria to Cape Town, a distance of 6,000 miles, he was regarded as a visionary; yet half the distance has been covered in fifteen years. The distance from Broken Hill to the Congo Free State is only 130 miles. Here the engineering difficulties are small. The chief task consists of clearing the land of high grass and trees, and in June alone the line was carried along for a distance of 35 miles. In July it was carried 29 miles farther. Between 2,000 and 3,000 men—British, foreign and natives—are employed, and the gangs have armed outposts to keep off fierce wild animals.

Lions lurk very near the line, and two were recently shot by an English engineer near Broken Hill station. The marksman took his aim from the back of the train. The line is now approaching the richest copper belt in the world, and Katanga, on the edge of this field, is expected to become a new Klondyke. Already a Protestant mission station has been established here. WILLIAM DURBAN.

Some Wonderful Bridge Work on the Cape-to-Cairo Railway

Prohibition and the Constitution

CONGRESS has full power to aid in the enforcement of prohibitory laws, says the Hon. William B. Hornblower.

Hon. William Butler Hornblower is recognized as one of the highest authorities in this country on constitutional law, both Federal and State. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently submitted to him a series of questions bearing on the power and the duty of Congress to put an end to the scandalous and demoralizing conditions in various parts of the Union, resulting from the granting of licenses to sell intoxicating liquors under Federal law in States and parts of States where the sale of liquor is prohibited by State law. Following are the questions, and Mr. Hornblower's replies:

Hon. William B. Hornblower

1. Would it be constitutional for Congress to enact that all liquor licenses issued by the Federal authorities shall be inoperative in States, or divisions of States, where the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited under State laws?

Yes. Such Federal licenses are now "inoperative" where the State law prohibits the sale. A Federal license (so-called) does not and cannot constitutionally authorize the sale of liquor in any State, or division of a State, where such sale is prohibited under State law. It does not and cannot constitutionally grant immunity to liquor dealers from the requirements or restrictions of State laws. All that it can do is to grant immunity from Federal prosecution under the Internal Revenue acts. If the State law requires a license fee, that fee must be paid as a condition precedent to the sale of liquor. If the State law prohibits the sale, that law can be enforced by the State regardless of any Federal license.

2. If such a law would be constitutional, would not the Federal authorities be under obligation to prosecute those selling liquor under the alleged protection of inoperative Federal licenses, and to aid and co-operate with State authorities in such prosecution?

Any one selling liquor without complying with the requirements of the Internal Revenue Law is liable to prosecution by the United States in the Federal Courts. If, however, in any State, or part of a State, the Federal law is so changed as to prohibit the granting of a valid Federal license, then the failure to obtain such a license, or the sale of liquor under a void license, would, in my opinion, simply leave the liquor dealers to be dealt with by the State authorities, just as they can be dealt with to-day. A Federal "license" does not now afford any "protection" to liquor dealers as against the State. They sell at their peril. Notwithstanding such "Federal licenses," they can be and are prosecuted by the State authorities under the State laws.

3. Has the Federal government a moral or legal right, under the Constitution, to grant licenses, as the Internal Revenue permits are called, for the sale of liquor when the State law prohibits such sale?

As I have already pointed out, the Federal license, whatever it may be called, does not grant any permit or right to sell liquor in contravention of State law. It merely certifies that the liquor dealer has paid the Federal tax and is immune from prosecution under the Internal Revenue laws in the Federal courts.

4. Does not the course at present followed by the Federal government, in granting liquor licenses when to sell liquor is a violation of State law, make the United States Government a partner and profit-sharer in law-breaking?

The answers to the former questions cover this question. It would, however, certainly be more seemly and more in accordance with propriety if the Federal law should be changed so as to withhold any "license" (so-called) in any State or district where the State law makes the sale of liquor illegal. There is an apparent (though not real) disregard of State law by the Federal government.

5. Is the action of the Federal government in granting liquor licenses in prohibition localities a violation of the right of the State to police its own territory and to enforce law and order therein?

The Federal license in no respect interferes with the enforcement of the State law, and therefore does not interfere with the police power of the States. The State authorities can and do close up liquor saloons without the slightest regard to the Federal license.

Judge Hornblower's father was for twelve years a professor in the Western Theological Seminary. His grandfather was Chief Justice of New Jersey, professor of law at Princeton and one of the founders of the American Bible Society. In 1893 Judge Hornblower was nominated by President Cleveland for Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. He never took his place on the Supreme Bench, but his great legal attainments and wide experience have made him an authority whose opinion is much sought after and highly valued.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—A REVIVAL HAS stirred up New Boston, Ia., under the preaching of Evangelist C. E. Hillis, of Kohoka, Mo. The last night of the meetings twenty-four persons came forward. Mr. Hillis and his singer, Mr. R. S. Dudley, are now conducting meetings in Montrose, Ia.

—THE NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY is planning for an appropriate celebration of the centennial of Bible Society work in New York City early next December. Various denominational bodies will give recognition to the event, and the observance will culminate with a great interdenominational meeting in Carnegie Hall December 3.

—THE GRAND ISLAND DISTRICT, North Nebraska Conference, has purchased a large tent, and has instituted an evangelistic campaign at Alda, Boelus and Scotia. The meetings have been very successful. Rev. E. B. Westhafer, evangelist, of Muncie, Ind., was selected as director. The later meetings began at Primrose, Neb., August 11.

—THE ELEVENTH STREET M. E. CHURCH of Philadelphia, Pa., is doing a pioneer work among the foreign population of that city. While many churches have been either closed entirely or have witnessed great curtailment of their usefulness, this church has stood its ground until now, after the encroachments of the foreign-born for more than twenty years, it finds itself a centre for work and service among those people.

—A CONFERENCE in the interest of evangelism by laymen will be held in New York City on Wednesday to Friday, November 3 to 5. The conference will be for the sole purpose of considering how a greatly multiplied number of strong Christian laymen may be led to engage in personal effort for the salvation of souls. Laymen from any evangelical church will be welcomed as delegates. The object is a direct forward movement by laymen for the evangelization of the multitudes outside the churches.

LEADING MEN OF THE NEW JAPAN

Distinguished Orientals Who Have Become Friends of Christianity

Count Taro Katsura
Prime Minister

Vice-Admiral M. Saito

Col. Hibiki

Mr. Muraoke

AMONG the many missionaries in Japan few are better known or have had as long an experience in the field as the Rev. H. Loomis, of the American Bible Society. Mr. Loomis is now in the United States, spending a brief vacation before returning to his post of duty at Yokohama. It has been his good fortune, in his long years of labor, to meet with many distinguished Orientals, and he recently gave to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some very interesting reminiscences, showing how many of the great men of Japan have become the true friends of Christianity.

The present Prime Minister of Japan is Count Taro Katsura, who won distinction as a general in the war with China and who has but recently entered political life. His first wife was a Christian. During his march through Manchuria he gave strict orders that all Christian property should be carefully protected. After his return to Japan, at the close of the war, and while ir the command of a division at Nagoya, he welcomed a visit from Mr. Loomis and ordered the men under his command to be formed in a hollow square, so that they could hear a Christian address; and then a copy of one of the Gospels was given to each. When the war occurred between Japan and Russia he was appointed Prime Minister; and when Mr. Loomis called upon him he said he heartily approved of Bible distribution; and, as it was not in his department to give permission, he would write to the Minister of War and assure him that it had his approval. He has now been appointed Prime Minister for the second time, and his kind, conciliatory spirit has rendered him especially popular as well as successful in his intercourse with the representatives of other nations. Like General Grant, he has won high distinction on the field of battle; but what he most desires is the establishment of peace and good will among all people.

To no man in Japan has the success of the Japanese armies been more due during the two recent wars than to General Kodama. He was Vice-Minister of War during the war with China, and Chief of Staff during the war with Russia. He is said to have planned both campaigns; and, if this be true, he has never been surpassed as a military strategist. General Kodama not only consented to the distribution of Scriptures among his soldiers, but supplied Mr. Loomis with a letter to each division commander, giving his consent to this work. This was especially helpful in the work among the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals. As Governor of Formosa, he won very high and deserved praise for his energetic and thoughtful efforts for the development of the country and the welfare of the people. His recent death was a great loss to the country.

Among the younger men who came to the front during the war with Russia is Admiral Saito, now Minister of the Navy. He was at one time attached to the Japanese Legation in Washington, and is a true and warm friend of the United States. Admiral Saito kindly offered to send to all the vessels of the navy any Scriptures or tracts that might be supplied by Mr. Loomis.

During the war with China Mr. Loomis was at Hiroshima, and called upon the officer then in military command at that place. The object of his visit was to distribute among the soldiers portions of the Scriptures. This was overheard by one of the members of the staff, who was standing near, and, turning to a companion, he remarked that "if the Bible could make such a change in other men as it had in Captain Hibiki it must be a good book." Inquiry was made as to who this Captain Hibiki was. It was ascertained that he had been very intemperate, and when intoxicated was a terror to the soldiers and every one else who came under his control. As he was passing a Christian church one Sunday he heard the singing and was attracted to the service. The result was a complete change in his life, and from that time he has been a leader in Christian work wherever he has been stationed. Rev. Dr. Fulton, of Kanazawa, writes of him: "He is the most earnest Christian I have ever met in Japan." During the Boxer troubles he was sent to Tientsin in charge of the Commissary Department, and as the result of his efforts a group of Japanese Christians was formed into a church, which soon after called a pastor and has been doing good work.

During the war with Russia he was the Chief of the Commissary Department. On going to Dalny he took with him a Christian staff, and had a Christian service the first day in the city. He took a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the men at the front and assisted in fitting up buildings for the use of the Y. M. C. A. at Yingchow and other places. Rev. Dr. De Forest writes of him thus: "What a nice talk I had with Colonel Hibiki yesterday, hearing of his morning prayers with his men and of 150 Chinese Christians working in the godowns. He readily agreed to speak last night, and gave a most earnest address on the need of preparation for another life."

Rev. N. Sahamoto is one of those who have devoted themselves to the welfare and development of Japan, and by their patient and persistent efforts created a public sentiment which has made reform not only possible but necessary for the peace and prosperity of the nation. In his early life he imbibed the teachings of Mill and Spencer, and considered it very foolish to make religion rather than philosophy the basis of national life. Having heard of the great power exerted by Christianity in Western countries, he began to think it would be a good thing to have it preached in Japan; but personally he was quite unconcerned about it. At length he was induced to read the Bible, and the result was his acceptance of its teachings and a public profession of his faith in Christ. This brought great opposition and many trials, but his strong faith and consistent life convinced many of the power of the Gospel to change the hearts and lives of those who embrace it.

Mr. Sahamoto became one of the founders and most prominent members of the Liberal Party, and for a time he devoted his attention to the promotion of certain reforms. Afterward, being much interested in the spiritual welfare of those around him, he took up Christian work and was ordained as a minister of the Presbyterian Church. In that capacity he has labored with untiring zeal and marked success. In the course of his ministry he visited one of the prisons where criminals of the worst type only were confined, and such was the power of the Spirit upon his hearers that 750 were convicted of sin and expressed a desire to follow Christ. The keepers were also deeply affected and a number of them accepted Christ as Saviour.

About ten years ago a Presbyterian elder named Muraoke started a printing company in Yokohama, and arranged that it should be inaugurated by a Christian service and that its management should be conducted in accordance with Christian principles. At the beginning of each week all work was suspended for a short service, consisting of singing, prayer, reading of the Scriptures and a brief sermon or address. The enterprise has been wonderfully successful. There are now four hundred employees, and the amount of business has grown to such an extent that the most of the time the capacity of the establishment is taxed to the utmost. In the publication of the Scriptures in the East this company has been a valuable factor. It has been doing all the Bible printing for Japan, and the larger part for the agencies in Korea, China and the Philippine Islands. The total publications for the year 1908 were 31,700 Bibles, 307,324 Testaments and 645,700 portions.

Owing to the fact that the Korean Emperor had shown a preference for the Chinese and Russians, and owing also to the continuous discontent among his own people, the Japanese insisted upon his abdication, and the Crown Prince was inaugurated in his stead. For the first time in Korean history the Emperor has paid a visit to different parts of the country, that he may see the condition of the people and study their welfare. Having no children of his own, he has appointed his youngest brother as his successor, and the latter is now being educated in Japan, with all the care and privileges due to royalty.

About fourteen years ago there was living in Russia a young Jew. He was unwilling to remain in a country where there were so many persecutions on account of race. He concluded to go to Eastern Siberia and seek employment on the railway. When he reached Japan he was obliged to wait some days at Nagasaki for a steamer to Vladivostok, and he concluded to utilize the time by finding out, if possible, if Christ fulfilled the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. He knew but a few words of English, but enough of German to be able to read and speak it to some extent. Providentially, he found Rev. Mr. Pieters, who was able to speak that language, and who gladly gave him the assistance he desired.

In the course of about two weeks he expressed his conviction that Christ was the long-looked-for Messiah and the Saviour of the world. At his earnest request he received baptism, and at the same time took the name of his teacher, A. A. Pieters. Mr. Loomis arranged to have him go to Korea as a colporteur. In three months he had acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to be able to travel. His mastery of the language was so conspicuous that he was asked to prepare a version of some of the Psalms from the Hebrew. An edition of 1,500 copies was printed, and it was quickly disposed of. He was then sent to the United States to take a course in theology, which he did with great credit to himself. During the vacations he went out among the churches, speaking on mission work in Korea. At the close of his seminary course, he passed the examination in Oriental languages and was awarded a scholarship of $600 for two years. This he declined, and accepted an appointment as a missionary to the Philippines, where he labored for two years and prepared a hymn-book in one of the dialects. At the end of two years he became naturalized as an American citizen, and then went back to Korea to take up regular missionary work. He is now in charge of some thirty country stations and he is acting pastor of one of the churches in the city of Seoul, a member of the Board of Bible Translators and acting treasurer of the Presbyterian Mission. To few people are given such varied talents and success in the Master's service. In his life is manifest what great things may be expected when the eyes of God's ancient and chosen people are fully opened to the fulfilment of prophecy and they accept Christ as Saviour and King.

Know Your Bible

WHEN Alexander the Great was plundering the palace of Darius, one of his soldiers found in a leather bag the crown jewels of Persia. The prize was worth millions, but the stupid fellow opened the bag, shook out the little glittering stones among the rubbish, and went away boasting about the fine sack he had got for carrying his food.

A slave was one day climbing a mountain when his foot slipped and he fell. To break the fall he caught a shrub, but it gave way, and man and bush went rolling together down the mountain side to the bottom. When he got up he noticed curious little white particles sticking to the roots. They looked like silver. He hastened back to the spot where the bush had grown, got down on his knees, and with his hands dug away a few inches of the soil. Lo! he had discovered the mines of Potosi, which have yielded hundreds of shiploads of solid silver. The owners of "the silver mountain," as it is called—for it is now honeycombed with more than five thousand silver mines—were up till that day poor men, for only the surface was theirs, as they knew nothing of the riches beneath.

You sing,

> Holy Bible, book divine—
> Precious treasure, thou art mine!

Is it yours only as the jewels belonged to the soldier, or as the silver mines belonged to the owners before the slave made his happy discovery? The scribes and Pharisees are said to have known the Bible so well that, if every Bible in the world had been destroyed, they could have rewritten it without a mistake from memory. What good did it do them?

The Bible in the hand won't do; the Bible in the head won't do; but the Bible in the heart—made a living thing by God's good Spirit—that means eternal life.

A New Way to Reach the Pole

FOR years people have heard the statement that "the North Pole will never be reached until they get an airship," just after some bold explorer had attempted to reach that elusive geographical point and failed. As the day of the airship seemed far off, even to those of the present generation, there seemed small prospect of making discoveries by the aerial method. But startling changes have taken place, and the airship is now looked upon as something which will be of practical utility in solving scientific and geographical questions. As this issue is going to press, one intrepid explorer has sailed away from Spitzbergen, in Norway, in hopes of reaching the Pole, while another aeronaut announces that he is making preparations to go as far south by land as possible and then, in a flying machine, dash to the South Pole.

Mr. Walter Wellman is the American who has gone in search of the North Pole. He has been interested in arctic discovery for fifteen years. He decided that, if a dirigible balloon could be invented, the Pole might be reached in a few days. One was built, and he has made one or two attempts to go "farthest north," but either the season or the weather has been against him. This time he believed he had a fair prospect of success. He has taken two assistants. The scientific world admires his daring, but say that the risks are so great that there are many chances against his returning alive.

Captain Roland V. Webster, who will try for the South Pole, has been commissioned by the Royal Geographical Society of England to go to the point reached on land by Lieutenant Shackleton and then go the rest of the way in the air. Of course, both of these aerial explorers may be doomed to failure and disappointment, but it shows what a hold aerial navigation has taken in public interest when men place their lives in the keeping of a bag of gas or some canvas stretchers, and learned and conservative societies back their undertakings with thousands of dollars. It is not too much of a prophecy to say that future explorations will doubtless depend for their success on aerial craft.

At Rheims, in France, aeronauts from many lands have met in an aerial tournament, while in almost every paper are the accounts of new machines and prominent men who are planning to become aeronauts. Even women are getting their own balloons. Aerial navigation seems destined to become a pastime with those who can afford it as much as was automobiling in the earlier years of the horseless wagon.

Aimless Lives

MULTITUDES go through life without any special object in view beyond the business or pleasure of the moment. Having education, health, wealth and opportunity, yet they live on without a serious thought beyond the needs of the hour or the demands of the social or business circle in which their lot is cast. That every life should have its object, its mission; that it is a precious trust committed to us, to be used for nobler purposes than mere selfish indulgence; that the world is a great training school, in which opportunities are afforded us for character building, for the development of human sympathy and helpfulness, and those qualities that go to the making of true manhood and womanhood—these are considerations which, unfortunately, are recognized by the few and ignored by the many. Not mere affluence, nor indulgence, but the cultivation of the higher qualities makes life worth living.

We have known people who were rich in the worldly sense, yet pitifully poor in all that should have made their existence a daily joy and delight. In the sheer struggle for wealth or pleasure they had lost sight of the ideal toward which all should strive. Not bad people, either; for, as the world reckons those things, they were good citizens, elegant entertainers, successful in their various enterprises, noted as patrons of art and science, and the rest of it; but the one thing that would have made them satisfied was lacking. They had never struck the note of altruism, nor learned the sweetness of self-sacrifice, or of living for others.

In a Western city, the other day, a young, beautiful and amiable woman bade the world good-by in a single tragic sentence: "The game is not worth the candle." She was a social favorite, but had grown tired of the hollowness, selfishness and make-believe of society life. Like the moth attracted to the white flame till it scorched its wings, she had become disillusioned and sick of the glitter and pretense of this mockery of living. The prizes that come to such lives are poor indeed in comparison with the happiness and peace of mind that spring up in the heart that is fixed on God, and which bends all its energies in his service and for the good of others.

Federal Laws and Prohibition

AN interesting phase of the much-discussed question as to the constitutional rights of prohibition States which find it difficult—in view of the Federal granting of excise tax receipts—to control the liquor traffic is presented in the interview with Hon. W. B. Hornblower, published on another page. Mr. Hornblower is an authority on constitutional law, and his opinion should carry weight, especially in those communities where the trouble now exists in an acute form. He points out the only available remedy for the present anomalous situation. While holding that it would be constitutional for Congress to enact that Federal excise tax receipts (which have been used in a sense as the equivalent of licenses) should be inoperative in prohibition territory, he points out that they are now inoperative wherever the sale is prohibited by State law. No Federal receipt can grant immunity to violators of State laws, although it may give immunity from Federal prosecution under the Internal Revenue Acts. State authorities and the local police, he declares, can close up saloons in prohibition territory without the slightest regard to Federal excise tax receipts, which saloon-keepers mistakenly use as a license.

Mr. Hornblower waives the question of the moral or legal right of the Federal government to antagonize the State laws in prohibition territory, and, while admitting that propriety might suggest the withholding of Federal excise privileges in such localities, he evidently is not disposed to adopt the view, suggested by Mr. Bryan, that Federal disregard of State laws makes the general government a partner and profit-sharer with the law-breaking saloons. The disregard, he points out, is merely an apparent one, for the prohibition States have in their own hands a remedy which is absolute and unquestioned.

GENERAL NOTES

—FROM CALIFORNIA comes news which will be welcomed by the scientific world. A geologist, Dr. S. Wilkins, announces the discovery, some twenty miles up the McCloud River from where it joins the Pitt River, of an extensive deposit of pitchblende, large enough to supply the world with radium for all time. He has obtained some fine specimens.

—THE CATHOLICS are engaged in a revision of the Catholic Latin Bible. The last revision, which is now used, is the Clementine text of the Vulgate of St. Jerome, which was made in 1593. For the purposes of the new revision the libraries of Europe have been ransacked in order to find, if possible, any existing manuscript copies of the Vulgate.

—THE CRETAN INCIDENT is ended. The attempt at independence has resulted in failure, the powers having ordered the Greek flag at Canea to be taken down. An international squadron enforced the lowering of the Greek colors on August 17. At the same time, Turkey has been warned against the employment of coercive measures and has been forbidden to send its fleet to Cretan waters. The whole matter will now be adjusted peacefully, through diplomacy.

—AMONG THE TURKS there are many statesmen and men of affairs who have a larger tolerance than the world gives them credit for. A mullah (teacher) was speaking of a journalist who had insisted that, in the new parliament, the Turks must dominate and that he himself would be a member of it. The mullah said: "The entry of such a fanatic would be a calamity for the country." A venerable ulema, on another occasion, said: "You have been told that we ecclesiastics are enemies of liberty, but whoever says so lies."

—FROM THE HEATHEN rites of the Voudoo to the strange doings that characterize some of our later "religious" fads may be a very long step, but there is a traceable connection. It is surprising in how many communities, even at this late day, we find ancient superstitions rife and rites practised that recall the Voudoo. In a Pennsylvania town lately a coroner was called to investigate the deaths of six little children, who had all been treated by "witch doctors." These had pronounced the little sufferers "verhexed" or "bewitched," and had used incantations and charms to break the spell. Of course, in the absence of proper treatment, the poor little things died.

—SEPTIC POISONING from motor dust, the result of much riding in an open automobile, is given as the cause of General Booth's illness. The veteran founder and Commander of the Salvation Army has struggled against his advancing ailment for many months, and is now threatened with blindness, which it is feared may terminate his public career. One of his eyes is practically sightless, and the other is to be operated upon for cataract. He is eighty-two years of age. Cases of eye-strain from exposure while motor riding are increasing. The wind-pressure on the eyeball flattens that organ, injuring the normal vision and producing premature far-sightedness, if nothing worse.

Moorish Fugitives at Melilla

General Marina Giving Orders

Spanish Encampment at Melilla Before a Battle

Spaniards and Moors at War

WHILE we have been playing war in this country in the bloodless contest waged in southeastern Massachusetts for the good of our service, they are having war in earnest in Morocco, where Spain is fighting the Moors. For the past five years the country at the back of Melilla has been divided between the adherents of the pretender El Roghi and those of the legitimate Sultan of Morocco. The Riff, as this region is called, is a mountainous country, inhabited by a very warlike race bitterly hostile to European aggression and exceedingly well armed. It is estimated that the army the Riff can furnish will require at least 200,000 Spaniards to overcome it. Even to keep open communication with the mines 10,000 men would be hardly sufficient. Three or four years ago a Spanish company was formed, under the presidency of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, Señor Villanueva, and a concession was obtained from the pretender to work certain mines. As the Spanish company worked slowly, another one, financed from Paris, but under the presidency of a Spaniard, Señor Garcia Alix, was formed and a second mine opened. The railway was opened to the mines, some distance back from the coast. The Moorish tribesmen were greatly incensed, and several of the Spanish workmen were killed. The Spanish troops were sent on a punitive expedition. They were in turn attacked by an overwhelming army of Moors. There is a report that the Spanish troops, under the command of General Marina, engaged with the tribesmen of the Riff in a fierce battle at Melilla, in which 5,000 were slain.

There was at first a strong protest from a minority of the Spanish people against the continuance of the war in Africa, as they felt that it was being carried on for the benefit of the mining companies and not to further the interests of the country as a whole. The anarchists of all countries, who have made Barcelona a meeting place for a number of years, took advantage of this discontent and brought about an open revolt, which threatened to spread to distant provinces. The insurgents, however, were found to be but a small minority, and the rebellion was speedily crushed. Spain is now free to deal with her foreign foe. While it appeared that only the property of some mining companies was threatened the people were not in favor of hostilities, but when it was seen that the country was in danger of losing all it has held in Africa the people felt that they must support their government.

Greed for gain is at the bottom of this war between Spain and the Moors, as it has been in most national conflicts. Thousands of precious lives in one battle is a dear price to pay for a scuffle between two mining companies for territory. With reference to this war, which has no semblance of principle as an excuse, the words of the Scripture are peculiarly applicable:

Wisdom is better than weapons of war. (Eccles. 9 : 18.)

Minister and Organist Drowned

The Rev. H. L. Mitchell, rector of the Episcopalian Church in Plymouth, Conn., had been camping near Noank, and took a party of six boys, which he had with him, upon a pleasure trip in Fisher's Island Sound. The craft was a catboat, with an engine. Under sail and with power it was making good speed when a sudden change of the wind caused the boom to jibe, and a boy seventeen years of age, by the name of Blakesley, was swept overboard. Mr. Mitchell, knowing that the boy could not swim, leaped into the water after him. As neither of the boys aboard was familiar with the engine, the boat went rapidly away from the strugglers. The pastor held the boy up as long as he could, and, being exhausted, he sank with the one he attempted to rescue.

Young Blakesley was the organist of the church of which Mr. Mitchell was rector, and was loved very much by his pastor. The lives of the boys in the boat had been committed especially to the pastor's care, and he counted his life as a trifling thing compared with the responsibility that had been reposed in him. It was not a rash thing for the pastor to do as he did. He hoped to save the boy and himself; yet he was not ignorant of the risk he was taking when he leaped into the water, but he did not consider that deliberation or caution had any claim upon him when the call of duty was so loud. It is likely his heroic act will be a more eloquent and effective sermon than those he might have preached during a natural life. In losing his life he really saved it, because he threw it down in answer to the call of love and duty.

He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it. (Matt. 10 : 39.)

Larger than Mammoth Cave

Professor Edgar L. Hewitt, the archæologist, has just discovered greater caves in the northeastern part of Arizona than the world-famed caverns of Kentucky. They have chasms and vaulted chambers in which an office building of forty stories could be stowed away, and are surrounded by ancient and mysterious ruins never before visited by a white man. The Indians have long known of the existence of these caves, but have kept it a secret. A Navajo guide led Professor Hewitt to them. Several natural bridges between hills in the vicinity the professor found so large as to make the rock bridges of Utah and Virginia look puny by comparison. The ruins contain relics, household articles, and remains of a race of which the archæologists have no trace. These caverns doubtless formed the shelter and home of early tribes, and this discovery will be of world-wide interest to scientific scholars.

And he came thither unto a cave, and lodged there. (I. Kings 19 : 9.)

Sets Song-Birds Free

Dr. Charles McCutcheon, a wealthy retired physician of Tacoma, Wash., has a large aviary in which he rears song birds imported from Europe, and then turns them loose in the fields and woods of the Northwest. English skylarks are singing in the meadows of Puget Sound, and linnets, goldfinches, bullfinches and English blackbirds are seen and heard all over the country west of the Cascade Mountains. Every day Dr. McCutcheon receives word that some of the birds he has set free have been seen, some as far away as fifty miles, where goldfinches are nesting and rearing their young. Five years ago the doctor brought fifty birds of each variety from Liverpool. The first winter he lost half of his flock; in the spring he released the remainder, which he heard from in different directions. Last spring he set free five hundred birds of seven varieties. Dr. McCutcheon said: "Ever since I was a boy in England, I have dreamed of the days when I rolled upon the green and listened to the skylarks and finches. I always said I would have a cage of these birds in my home. But it is a sin to confine the tender creatures; they will not sing as sweetly as they do in the open, and there is a beauty about a landscape that has its song-birds which is not seen in a stretch of country as still as a tomb."

Large numbers of men, women and children in the State of Washington are grateful to Dr. McCutcheon for his benevolent service, and the State Legislature has passed a stringent law which will protect the songsters that have been set free. We have here the example of a man who lived a strenuous life and one of benevolence in one of the learned professions, making a contribution to the health and life of the community, and now in his honorable retirement he has set himself to the task of making God's little creatures happy and filling the world with song for his fellow-men. We need not wait until our fortunes have been made to bless our fellow-men, but can do so while at our practical engagements, in scattering sunshine and song to those about us.

And shall let the living bird loose into the open field. (Lev. 14:7.)

The First Savings Bank

Next May, the one hundredth anniversay of the first savings bank in the world will be celebrated. As with all such things, there has been a dispute as to where and when these institutions originated. A French writer dates them back to 1610, when Hugues Delestre proposed something of the kind; while another author insists that a genuine savings bank existed in Brunswick in 1765, and others hold that similar institutions had been previously founded in Hamburg, Berne and Geneva. But these were all different from the savings bank of to-day. The English have maintained that the system of savings banks dates from the schemes of Rev. Joseph Smith and Mrs. Priscilla Wakefield. The former, in 1798, while stationed in the parish of Wendover, offered to receive from members of his congregation any sum from twopence up, to be returned at Christmas, with one-third of the whole added as interest. The first modern savings bank, however, was the one for whose hundredth anniversary preparations are now being made. This was originated by Mr. Henry Duncan, a Presbyterian clergyman of Dumfriesshire, Scotland, a friend of Thomas Carlyle and of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers. In 1810, after he had set forth his views on the subject in the Dumfries Courier, he established the Ruthwell Savings Bank. His purpose was to induce the common people of his time to realize the value of little savings and accumulations. It was good territory for such an institution. During the first year £150 sterling were deposited; the second year, £171; the third £241, and the fourth, £922.

These savings banks in all countries, in communities small and great, have grown to be among the most powerful and helpful institutions in the world —the expressions of industry, enterprise, thrift, and especially economy on a small scale. They are an embodiment of the little savings of the many people. In the spiritual realm, as well as the material, the great things are made of the many small things, and character and destiny are the utilization of the little minutes that are marked by the hand upon the clock. The neglect to employ these little moments and opportunities will result in a loss of fortune, material and moral.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. (John 6: 12.)

Authorities on the "New Religion"

THIS week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives space to another quota of letters from prominent professors, and others eminent in public life, on the "New Religion." These will be read with interest, not only for their able analysis of Dr. Eliot's views, but for their sound, helpful orthodoxy.

Plagiarized from Christianity

By HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN, Lincoln, Neb.

I am surprised that Dr. Eliot's declaration on the subject of religion should excite so much comment. I understand that it is simply a reiteration of views long held by him and frequently expressed. His address presents an excellent illustration of rarified learning. He seems to think that a system of morality can be built upon reason alone, forgetting that those who attempt to frame such a system are so saturated with the morals derived from revealed religion that they can not rid themselves of its influence. The good features of the religious system which he proposes are plagiarized from Christianity, and the rest of his system is borrowed from those who have denied the divinity of Christ and refused to consider the Bible an inspired book.

For instance, he would make love and service the basis of his religious system; but he neglects to acknowledge that Christ established these doctrines by his teachings, his life and his death.

At all times, since the beginning of the Christian era, there have been those who, though they denied the divinity of Christ, were influenced by his example, and there have also been those who, while professing belief in him, have disregarded his teachings; but in spite of the latter, and with some assistance from the former, Christianity has moved on and is gradually but surely bringing the world into harmony with the divine plan.

The Christion life is, after all, the unanswerable argument in support of the Christian religion, and the Christian life which Dr. Eliot leads will probably aid Christianity more than his words can harm it. His many virtues are unconscious imitations of the Nazarene, while his protestations are merely the effort of the reason to magnify itself at the expense of faith.

It is the old conflict between the head and the heart for the mastery of the life, and, however the issue may be decided with him and with those for whom he speaks, it will not disturb the multiplying hosts of the Christian Church, to whom the Creator is, and will remain, a personal God, Christ the Way, the Truth and the Life, and the Bible a trusted guide.

The Authority of Christianity

By PROF. C. H. FRENCH, President of Huron College

Dr. Eliot's first objection is to authority as "the basis of religion." Of the questions raised in the discussion this is the most fundamental. The kind of authority that forms the basis of religion is an inherent and therefore necessary element in life. It is not inherent in the command of any king, even though that king be supposed to sit on the throne of God. Its validity is not dependent upon any external power or condition. It is dependent upon the very nature of things, as established by the order of creation.

In the more important matters of life, the voice of my own soul is authoritative for me, because I cannot refer to any other court of knowledge. Moreover, my soul recognizes authority in the voice of God, not because he sits on a throne, but because he is the divine prototype of my soul, and because the thing he commands is the most natural and satisfactory thing possible for the normal soul to do. Authority is an inherent element in life. Religion is one of the expressions of life. Therefore authority cannot be eliminated from religion without making it an imperfect expression of life.

As I understand the Christian religion, it is and always has been "wholly monotheistic." This is an essential part of the doctrine of the Trinity. When one speaks of the "deification of remarkable human beings," referring to Jesus, he comes perilously near begging the question. He is using human language and ideas to describe an event which can be adequately known only by revelation.

I do not understand that the Christian religion has ever taught the hopeless wickedness or the divine condemnation of the mass of mankind. Some men have believed and taught such things, and doubtless some men are hopelessly wicked, and so under divine condemnation; but man is made in the image of God, and an adequate salvation is offered to all. Therefore man cannot be called hopelessly wicked.

The Christian religion lauds God's love above everything else. If it has been "buried by dogma or creed," the fault belongs to man, not to religion. "Love of God and service to one's fellow-man" are the two fundamental things required by the two great commandments, as stated by Jesus.

Huron, S. Dak. C. H. FRENCH.

No Creedless Religion Possible

By PRESIDENT J. C. KILGO, of Trinity College, Durham, N. C.

The ideas in Dr. Eliot's creed, which the Christian world will flatly deny, are by no means new. They are the same old conceptions of naturalism which have been in the earth from the beginning. Of the denial of authority in religion, David used these very strong terms: "The fool hath said in his heart, no God," which is not a denial of the existence, but the authority, of God. In these times it has come to be a fad with the academic world to rail out against "tradition" and "authority" in religious thought, while these same gentlemen are the inveterate and intolerant defenders and promulgators of traditions in science, literature, philosophy and history. They like all sorts of traditions, save religious traditions, against which they have an irreconcilable mental and moral phobia. Why there should be authority in the organization of a university, and why ever a game of baseball cannot be played without Spaulding's Rules and an umpire, and yet the whole system of religion must be run on the lines of chaos and anarchy, is a position that is curious, to say the least.

There is not a doctrine in the Christian religion that has not been verified in the experiences of the millions on millions of the saintliest men and women who have lived in the world. If scientific methods are compelled to overhaul our religious doctrines, let them be inductive and deal with facts, instead of deductive, dealing with spiritual things in the light of material assumptions.

It seems a little less than nonsense to talk about a creedless religion, and those who condemn creeds and dogmas always commit the inconsistent blunder of doing it by setting forth a creed. So Dr. Eliot opposes creeds with a creed, and condemns dogma with dogma; all of which shows that creeds are necessary to human thinking. As well talk of mathematics without rules, and chemistry without formulæ, as to talk about religion without formal statements of ideas. There will never be, among saints or atheists, such a fine vaporing as a creedless religion!

There are positively not the slightest signs that the world needs a new religion, and, if it did need a new religion, the lessons of history do not show that its first form will be a new theory, or that it will come out of a college faculty. The whole world sorely needs a revival of religion; but every revival has been no more than a return to an apostolic truth which the world had lost, and the revival always preceded the theology which followed it. Life first, and after life, theology, is the divine order.

The deepest cry of the human heart is a religious cry—not the cry for evolution, but for salvation. And Christ alone has answered this universal cry—universal, save among some of the academic gentlemen. Dr. Eliot's creed will not suddenly start a world-wide revival and make the East Side look like Fifth Avenue. However, the world sorely needs a deeper knowledge of Jesus Christ and a fuller experience of his divine life, and unto this end all men should pray and labor.

JOHN C. KILGO.

United States Senator Dolliver's View of Dr. Eliot's Doctrine

Judging from the brief newspaper reports, which are embodied in your letter, I would say that the doctor's new religion has the appearance of a certain antiquity. Whatever else it may be, it cannot be called new, and, if I have gotten hold of the correct history of the world, it is not likely to amount to as much now as it did a century ago and over.

ONCE A POLICEMAN, NOW AN EVANGELIST

ONE of the most successful workers at Coney Island this year is ex-Policeman John E. Brown. He is gifted with natural ability and is the possessor of a voice that can be heard two or three blocks away. With a few assistants and a small organ, he stands at the corner of Surf Avenue and sings Gospel hymns and proclaims Christ to the crowds of pleasure-seekers. Associated with the ex-policeman is a Canarsie fisherman, John Schumacker, an excellent singer, who does much to hold the crowds by his persuasive voice.

The story ex-Policeman Brown tells of the love of God in saving him from a drunkard's grave never fails to interest his auditors. It is now nearly a quarter of a century since he came to Brooklyn from a little village on the north shore of Long Island. He was then a lad of seventeen. He had been brought up as a Sunday School boy, and trained by a praying mother, but fell into bad company. He learned by degrees to drink, and the habit grew on him till at last it became the bane of his life.

Ex-Policeman Brown Preaching to an Evening Crowd at Coney Island

A politician gave him the first drink of liquor that started him on his downward career. Strange to say, when he was afterward arrested for intoxication, he was taken before this man (who had become a magistrate) and committed to Raymond Street Jail. The magistrate was himself a drinking man, and owned a big saloon, but he had no pity for the young man he had helped to degrade. For fifteen years Brown continued his wrecked career, impoverishing himself and his family. His mother and his wife sought God in prayer for his conversion, and waited patiently for an answer. The answer came nine years ago. He became a changed man, giving God the glory for the great transformation in his life.

Mr. Brown is a powerful open-air speaker, as he is familiar with the vernacular of the common people. He knows how to hold them while he tells the story of his conversion. He takes no collections, but gives his services without money and without price. For the past three years he has been preaching in a Gospel church on the corner of Hopkinson Avenue and McDonough Street. This work, like the other, is entirely undenominational, and here also he labors without pay.

He is a painter, and earns enough money at his trade to support himself and family. Thus far the Lord has greatly blessed his labors along the sea-beach and elsewhere.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

His Excellency Chang Yin-Tang

The United States Waterways Commission

Copyright, 1909, by Paul Thompson

Hor. Charles R. Crane

IT is a remarkable coincidence that just as this country sends a new Minister to represent its extensive interests in China the latter country has changed its diplomatic representative at Washington.

The American Minister, who has already departed for his post at Peking, is the Hon. Charles R. Crane, of Chicago. The Chinese Minister is His Excellency Chang Yin-Tang. It is Mr. Crane's first public office in the gift of the government, and the appointment came to him "as a bolt from the blue," as he expresses it. It was a case of the office seeking the man. The new Minister has been noted as a municipal reformer in his home city, serving for some time as president of the Municipal Voters' League, an organization which has achieved notable results in bettering certain political conditions in Chicago. Mr. Crane is a well-known merchant, and is probably as well acquainted with the various difficulties and advantages of maintaining the "open door" in China as any man who could have been selected to keep watch over America's interests. It also may truthfully be said that he has been appointed to look after the interests of China as well, for recent events plainly indicate that the Chinese government regards America as its best friend among the Powers, for while we desire to secure our share of the growing trade with the Celestials we have never indicated any desire to take off attractive slices of her territory or to use her to further our own interests in controversies with other countries. Among those who were acquainted with Mr. Crane and his extensive knowledge of Eastern affairs, were four personal friends who are members of President Taft's Cabinet, and it is through their representations, in great part, that the post was offered to him.

Mr. Crane will not go as a stranger to China. He has always been interested in everything that pertains to life in the East. He went to China as a young man, and established himself in the bustling city of Canton for the purpose of studying its people, customs, language and industries. This was in 1880. He secured the services of an educated Chinese, and under his guidance spent four profitable months.

Later, he made several journeys to Russia, and his knowledge of things Russian is said to be hardly surpassed by that of any other American traveler. As the affairs of China are more or less connected with Russia, this will stand him in good stead.

The new Minister from China, His Excellency Chang Yin-Tang, is a great admirer of America and American methods in business, which he hopes to see applied in his own country. Just before he left Peking he had a long interview with the Prince Regent, who urged him to use his utmost endeavors to cement the bonds of friendship between the two countries. He also spoke of the desirability of securing our aid in furthering the educational and industrial progress of China. His Excellency's son, Henry Chang, is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania.

CONGRESS has sent abroad this summer a Waterways Commission, composed of some of the most distinguished members of both the Senate and House of Representatives. Their expenses will be paid by the government, and they will devote their time to the study of the waterways of Europe and the methods employed to make them serviceable to commerce. This will include harbors, rivers and artificial waterways. The delegation will be abroad for two or more months, and they will visit practically every European State of importance. The commission posed for the accompanying photograph just before the steamer sailed. The members are Hon. De A. S. Alexander, Hon. Stephen M. Sparkman, Hon. Theodore E. Burton and James H. Cassidy. Governments abroad have placed every facility at the disposal of the commission for making their investigations, while Americans resident in European cities have planned that their various stops will be made pleasant in a social way.

The report of the commission will be presented at the next session of Congress. Appointments on the commission were eagerly sought for, and the expression on the faces of the delegation show plainly that they regard the work before them as anything but an unpleasant task.

A Young Girl Evangelist

THIS is an age of phenomenal children. Among the most extraordinary of these must be numbered little Inez Bower, of Huntington Park, Calif.

Inez Bower

She is only twelve years old, and is a student in the Training School for Christian Workers, where her mother is the principal of the academic department. This young girl, in her childish short frock and with her hair tied with the wide ribbon bows which children wear, speaks before large audiences, often moving them to tears and touching many hearts. No one helps her in the preparation of her discourses. They seem to spring straight from her own bright mind and loving, innocent heart. She is in great demand as a speaker; but she is to be thoroughly educated before she will be permitted to devote much time to evangelistic work. Inez's family belongs to the Society of Friends. In that organization girls and women are early encouraged to utter the thoughts which the Spirit inspires. Many of our most noble and useful women, such as Inez Bower promises to become, have been trained among the Quakers.

Damascus by its present railway lines would tap the Bagdad line near Aleppo. But undoubtedly travel would go forth from the gates of Damascus, as it went forth thousands of years ago.

I have previously written something about this Bagdad railway. When the Young Turks came into control the subject was taken up, and inquiry was made into the status of the project. The line from Constantinople still halts at Koniah, or near there, and no one can predict when it will get beyond the Tarsus Mountains. Nevertheless, efforts are making to harmonize the interests of the German bankers, who hold the concession, with the French and English capitalists, whose co-operation may be obtained if it is made an international line.

The plans of Sir William Willcocks, however, need not be delayed by slowness in building the western section through Bagdad and down to the headwaters of the Persian Gulf. His idea is that construction should proceed from both ends toward the middle, and that the Persian Gulf section should begin at the same time as the irrigation works. Now no one can tell just when these irrigation works will begin, because after Sir William Willcocks makes his report and exhibits his plan in detail the Young Turks or the Turkish government will have to find funds for the project, and in the political intrigues that surround them they may not be able to secure these funds at once. Nevertheless, the repopulating of this region and its restoration to the area of crop-producing soils is certain to come in time. It has back of it the faith of a great engineer, who already has done wonders, and it has commercial possibilities which will command the support of capitalists.

Dr. Dowkontt Passes Away

DR. GEORGE D. DOWKONTT, physician, author and notable Christian worker, passed away recently at the home of his son in Brooklyn, N. Y., at the age of sixty-seven.

The Late Dr. Dowkontt

Dr. Dowkontt, whose work is well known to many readers of this paper, came to the United States in 1878. He established the first free dispensary ever opened in New York. A few years later, he opened the International Medical Missionary Institute. He was the author of several books on missionary subjects, and helped to train many young medical missionaries. He leaves a widow, two sons, both ministers, and three daughters.

A REMARKABLE REVIVAL IN CHINA

OUR correspondents in China write of a great revival wave which is gradually extending over a large part of the ancient empire. The photograph on this page gives a characteristic scene. It shows a Gospel mass-meeting in progress on the China Inland Mission premises. Two thousand five hundred natives are kneeling reverently in prayer, in which Dr. Wong is leading, while Rev. W. R. Newell is on the upper veranda, prepared to give the Gospel message which will be interpreted by Mr. Nance, of Soochow. This was one of the closing meetings of Mr. Newell's wonderful Shanghai campaign, during which all classes and conditions of Chinese were reached by the spoken Word.

Some of the meetings in the Chinese Inland Mission grounds at Shanghai were phenomenal in point of attendance. On several occasions the audiences numbered over 2,000. Confessions were made by natives of all ranks and by pastors, elders, deacons, evangelists, Bible-women, church members, and enquirers of both sexes. Idolatry, gambling, opium smoking, theft, fraud, Sabbath breaking, hatred, divisions, misappropriation of church funds, were among the sins publicly confessed. Similar scenes were enacted at great Gospel gatherings in Nanking, Tsingkiang-pu and Antung-ku.

Many Christians are praying for a general revival in China. Word has come of the outpouring of the Spirit in several provinces. In Kan-suh there is a city called Liang-chow, and at the first meeting there forty or fifty people broke down, weeping and sobbing and confessing their sins. One man, who brought his opium set to be burned, fell on the ground, confessing that he was also a gambler. Many other remarkable conversions are reported.

According to the latest statistics there are now in China nearly 4,000 missionaries, including physicians, connected with the Protestant foreign missions. There are over 5,000 stations and outstations. The total number of communicants reported at the Shanghai Conference in 1907 was 154,000, but the total number of Chinese Christians, according to Dr. Richards, is 720,540.

Former United States Minister Rockhill, who lately returned to Washington from China, expresses the conviction that that country is steadily progressing toward reforms in governmental administration and is making an earnest effort to develop her vast natural resources. Prospects of an absolute adherence to the reforms pledged by the late emperor and empress dowager, harmonious relations with foreigners and friendship for them, prospects for a temporary improvement in the monetary situation, a decrease in the use of opium and the development of educational reform are among the impressions gained by Mr. Rockhill. A consistently friendly attitude is displayed by the Chinese toward foreigners of all nationalities, particularly Americans. During the four years he had charge of the American mission Mr. Rockhill knew of but one serious outrage on missionaries, and that was settled promptly and satisfactorily by the Chinese government. There is a strong and steadily growing bond of amity between the two nations.

KANSAS COLORED WOMEN AND THE BIBLE

ONE of the most impressive of the many and varied graduating exercises held in Topeka this spring was that of the Berean Bible Class, organized in November, 1908, under the leadership of Mrs. C. F. Menninger. As our little party passed through the crowded aisles of the Presbyterian Church we felt that atmosphere of hushed expectancy which is always noticeable at class graduations. Miss Georgia Watkins, herself a graduate from Washburn College and the daughter of S. G. Watkins, one of the early colored graduates of Oberlin, O., played the opening march, during which forty-seven women passed into the three front rows of seats, where all stood, dressed in simple white, and in response to a signal from their teacher repeated in concert the twenty-third Psalm. The Rev. J. E. Edwards, pastor of St. John's A. M. E. Church, offered a prayer, eloquent with gratitude for the occasion that promised so much for the right upbuilding of his people and the strengthening of their churches.

The teacher, Mrs. Menninger, then took the class rapidly through the book of Acts, the class repeating in concert the title and leading verse of each chapter.

Mrs. Electro Page Perry sang Tosti's "Good-by to Summer." This was followed by a brief address to the class from Rev. T. C. Nicholson. He said the most remarkable and encouraging feature in the Berean Bible Class was that most of its members were housewives, busy mothers of growing families, women who recognized their duty to church and society. That such women had voluntarily taken up so continuous and thorough a study of the Bible was most significant, because it seemed a fulfilment of Joel's prophecy as recorded in Acts 2:17, "And your daughters shall prophesy."

Mr. Nicholson addressed the leader in a few words, assuring her that her work among his people exemplified the strength and beauty of Paul's life in the fact that Paul took up his apostleship among the Gentiles with the same unflagging interest that characterized all of his preceding work. Then the class answered rapidly, in concert, one hundred questions on the book of Acts. The teacher said there had been no previous drill for this peculiar class exercise. All of these questions except two or three were answered immediately by a full volume of voices, showing readiness of speech and faithful study.

Mrs. D. G. Kline gave the class report. She said: "The class deserved the name Berean, for we are told the 'Bereans searched the Scriptures daily,' and here was proof that their example had been followed closely. Of the fifty-one members, forty-one were graded 100, which means the answering of every question and reciting one verse for each chapter of the book of Acts; and the few who had been unable to attend regularly had kept up their lessons at home and received a splendid grade." After the reading of the class report the teacher asked those who had been absent but once to arise, and several stood. She then asked for those who had been absent but twice, and several more stood.

Mrs. Jamison Miss Jeltz

Prominent in the Work of the Class

The diplomas were presented by Professor Ridley, secretary of the Y. M. C. A. These diplomas represent the completion of the first year of a four years' course. Next year's study will add another star to them. When a diploma has four stars, it is to be signed by the pastor, showing a completed course of Bible study.

Of this class the teacher said, in a private talk: "I have enjoyed teaching these colored women more than any other class, because they are so grateful. It rests me to come into their presence. All of them answer all of the questions, memorize very carefully and seem to consider the weekly meetings of the Berean Class their central duty and delight."

Among these pupils several teach Bible classes, and several teach in the public schools. Miss Jeltz, though young in years, has taught in the city schools six years. She is principal of the Sunday School Primary Department, and her intelligent encouragement and example was of great help to Mrs. Menninger. Mrs. Jamison, another all round teacher, organized a mothers' meeting, which convenes weekly in her schoolroom. Recently, standing on the steps of that building, telling me about the results of those meetings, she called my attention to two young women, chatting in a well-kept yard near by, and said: "Notice how neat they look! We encourage them to bathe and dress up when the forenoon's work ends, not to lounge afternoons in untidy clothes." We had just closed the door upon a group of tidy, happy-faced mothers, talking earnestly about the needs of their churches and homes, and as my eyes fell upon those women—because there is no antedating one's flashes of memory—there passed suddenly before me in quick review seven thousand colored people who came into our city the winter of the exodus, in 1893. They were from the extreme Southern States, and, driven by sharp exigencies, unparalleled by any other race of people, were in immediate need—morally, mentally and physically. They had been encouraged to come into Kansas, forty thousand strong, by Governor St. John. Four thousand of the seven thousand, who were cared for that winter in barracks built by the city, settled among us. Whether or not any of these educated, well-to-do, consistent Christian colored people belong to the men, women and children who then came to us matters little. We have worked out a local problem, and, whatever may be the racial traits ascribed to them, they are easily altered for the better, and the greatest service the white race can render the negro race is to encourage and assist them to immediately become useful members of society. Meanwhile, the negro has learned that happiness, contentment and education come through his own efforts, as applied to what is near at hand, and loyalty to his own race.

Looking for Employment

At this time of the year, a host of young people of both sexes are looking for remunerative employment. They have finished their school education or have been graduated from college. Some of them know definitely for what they are prepared, while others have only a slight notion of the niche they would like to fill. Young men and women in country homes turn wistful eyes to the nearest large town. There is no money to be made on the farm; but the children have grown up in the anticipation of self-support, and they must find a vacancy waiting for them at a distance from the home nest. Whenever it is possible, a situation should be found before the country boy or the country girl starts for the city. If this is not practicable, arrangements should be made beforehand for their being safely lodged with trustworthy people. They should be provided with letters of introduction to a pastor of their denomination, and should at once seek out a church home. Also, they should have in hand money sufficient to carry them over the first few weeks, while they are in quest of work.

The Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations extend friendly hands to young people coming to town, and the secretaries of both may be relied upon for counsel and encouragement. The homeless young man or woman—the word homeless being used in the sense of detachment from a settled home—may confidently look for a welcome in Association rooms at all times.

The best way to secure a situation, if one be out of employment, is to search the columns of the daily newspapers and answer advertisements. Almost invariably there will be found in the list of help wanted something that one can do, and in numerous instances the connection thus formed sets the feet of the applicant on the first round of the ladder by which he or she may climb to success. The novice cannot expect a large salary until a period of apprenticeship has been served. Training is a requisite in most business offices. There is a regular course of gradation in both wholesale and retail houses, and the person who comes in from the outside must often begin at the bottom and work onward from one grade to another. This happens in the case of the young man whose father has wealth, and who may yet arrive at a place in the firm, just as it happens in the case of the lad who is dependent on his own brains and hands.

A young woman exceptionally qualified, versatile and accustomed to the requirements of business, a few months ago dropped out of a position which she had successfully held. She had excellent recommendations and needed only opportunity to demonstrate her value in any capacity which she might be called upon to fill. Yet six months passed before she was again placed in a position suited to her ability. During the six months she tried successively teaching, bookkeeping, copying manuscripts on the typewriter, reading proof sheets, criticising literary work and canvassing for subscriptions to a periodical. She finally, almost as it seemed by accident, found precisely the employment she was looking for, at a living rate of wage. To all seeking employment the advice is pertinent, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again."

THE HAYMAKERS

Sunlight, sun bright,
Darting your rays to left, to right,
Gently shine on the fragrant hay,
Where the children sleep through the summer day.

Star spark, evening dark,
Moon afloat in your silver bark,
Come with your softly cooling gloam,
And lead the tired haymakers home.

Politeness to Children

Good manners are acquired by imitation. Whoever wishes children to be polite must take a little pains to treat them politely. It is as easy to say "please" and "thank you" to a small boy as to order him gruffly to go there or do this, and to omit thanking him for the service. Children who never encounter rudeness at home are not likely to be rude there or elsewhere. The little forms or conventions about which many people give themselves a great deal of anxiety are of trifling importance in comparison with a habit of invariably treating one's elders with deference and one's juniors with kindness. If charity begins at home, so does politeness, and one is worth as much in social intercourse as the other.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

H. A. P. Invite your friends to luncheon and announce your engagement when the dessert is brought in. You may announce it yourself, or your mother, sister or intimate friend may do it for you. The favors at such a luncheon may be Cupids or have some reference to love and mating.

—Dislikes Untidiness. "My son is engaged to a young woman who is very untidy. I notice that her hair is far from neat, and she uses pins when she ought to take stitches. This disturbs me very much." After all, your son, and not you, is the person most concerned. The young lady may reform, or you may have seen her at exceptional moments.

Traveling in Summer

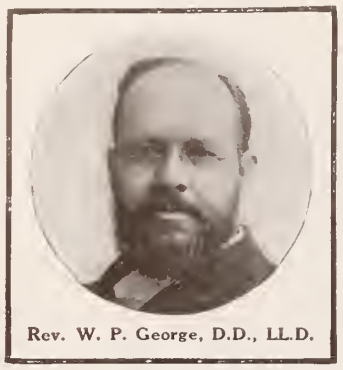
"It is traveling," said dear little Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, "if you take a nightgown." The dear child felt that the short journey that involved a stopping over-night, and going to bed in a strange house, was just as really traveling as if she had crossed the continent. She was quite right. Traveling, like everything else, is measured by experience and familiarity. To the man who has crossed the Atlantic forty times, the wide ocean is only a long ferry. To the novice the ocean seems vast and full of terrors. The woman who has never spent a night on a sleeping-car wonders how she will adjust herself in the narrow space of the curtained berth, how she will manage to disrobe for the night and dress in the morning, and is not a little troubled lest she shall transgress some of the proprieties. One who travels much and often understands how to be as comfortable on a long journey as on a short jaunt. The warm season woos us to holiday excursions, and while business men are always on the road irrespective of weather and temperature, pleasure-seekers are more in the way of going to and fro in summer.

In order to travel agreeably, one should have a definite plan before setting out. Study the time-table, arrange in good season for the transportation of luggage, bear in mind that express companies need a little more margin in summer than at other seasons. If you have trunks to be checked, go to the railway station in time to identify them and get the business over without haste and flurry. Never burden yourself unnecessarily with heavy suit-cases, that may as well go in the baggage-car. Confine your hand luggage to light bags and articles that neither encumber the seat nor tire you. Have all baggage very plainly marked. Keep your ticket in a pocketbook or satchel, where you can get it quickly and conveniently without fumbling through the contents of a purse or bag and wasting the conductor's time. Be courteous to fellow-passengers on train and steamboat, but do not pick up new acquaintances too readily. Ask for counsel and direction from the officials of the road, and not from fellow-passengers.

Opportunities for securing refreshments are, as a rule, presented on all trains. The trains that speed across the continent are in reality moving hotels, and the dining-car service is usually excellent. Still the experienced traveler learns that it is well to provide against accidents and emergencies by carrying something in the nature of a private luncheon. Some of us can remember times when the commissariat gave out unexpectedly, trains having been unfortunately delayed and connection missed. Then it was that biscuits, beef extract, and chocolate creams proved themselves friends in need. We ought to travel, if we can. Even a trolley trip may be a very remunerative method of traveling.

THE LATE DR. W. P. GEORGE

REV. WILLIAM POTTS GEORGE, D.D., LL.LD., who passed away recently at his home in Pawling, N. Y., had long been a well-known figure in Methodism. He was born in Coatford, England, sixty-two years ago, and received a good education in that country. He was converted early in life, and became a local preacher in the Wesleyan connection. Coming to the United States, he secured a position as secretary to a leading Methodist Bishop, and shortly afterward took a theological course and was graduated and ordained to the Methodist ministry. His natural gifts were very marked and he became popular as a preacher and lecturer. He had charges in Greenville and Newark, N. J.; Detroit, Mich.; Kansas City, Seattle, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and other places, and his eloquence and vigor in Gospel presentation won him a welcome in many pulpits. In 1892 he married Miss Henrietta Duncan, of Bradford, Pa. For many years he was a well-known figure at the great Methodist camp meetings at Ocean Grove and Mount Tabor. In the spring of 1908 he was appointed as pastor of the famous old Bedford Street M. E. Church, New York City, and a few months ago he entered on his last charge at Pawling, N. Y., where he contracted the sickness that closed his earthly career.



Rev. W. P. George, D.D., LL.D.

Dr. George was a man of genial personality, and he had a wide range of accomplishments, the result of much travel, thorough reading and a deep study of human character. From time to time his sermons have appeared in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and he was a welcome visitor and speaker at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, where the little folks and grown-ups equally enjoyed his entertaining addresses, full of vigor and replete with telling illustrations. He was a warm friend and supporter of Taylor University, and his influence and ability contributed in no small degree to the upbuilding of that institution in its early years of struggle. He leaves a widow, who has the cordial sympathy of a very large circle of friends throughout the country. The funeral services were held in Pawling, N. Y., Tuesday, August 17, Rev. W. G. Browning, Rev. George L. Davis and Rev. Geo. E. Wright, of Taghkanick, N.Y., participating. All the stores were closed on the day of the funeral, and the interment took place the following day in the family plot in Fairmount Cemetery, Newark, N. J.

The services at the cemetery were conducted by the Rev. James William Marshall, pastor of the First M. E. Church, New Brunswick, N. J. He spoke eloquently and feelingly of his long and delightful personal acquaintance with Dr. George, which had extended over twenty-five years. The two had made a compact that he who survived the other should preach at the funeral and inter the body. He spoke from Ps. 39:4, which contemplates the end of life. Personality, however, survives death, and he said Dr. George had a distinguished personality; he was endowed with fine personal presence, great intellect and large spiritual possibilities. He came of the best Wesleyan stock; his ancestors were persecuted for the sake of their evangelical Christianity. He told of Dr. George's early conversion and his training for the ministry; of his friendship for the celebrated Dr. Watkinson, Rev. Morley Punshon, and other distinguished men. He became a noted preacher, and on one occasion President Roosevelt declared one of Dr. George's sermons to be the greatest he had ever heard. He was a deep student, an expert in history, versed in science, and a critic of the Greek text of the Scriptures; yet he was always sound in doctrine, and preached Jesus Christ and his salvation. The speaker closed with a glowing tribute to the memory of the deceased clergyman.

PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IT was not easy for Paul and his little company of followers to leave Miletus and its gathering of Ephesian elders. Traveling in those days was quite another thing from traveling as we know it. There were neither railways, steamships, nor regular conveyances of any description. Luke writes: "Finding a ship [evidently an ordinary trading ship] sailing over into Phœnicia, we went aboard, and set forth."

The ship was bound for Tyre, and there the little company landed, and found disciples. For seven days the little party remained in Tyre. Days, no doubt, of great blessing to the Tyrian Church, which witnessed for the Lord in the midst of the merchant city, full of worldliness. Some of the Tyrian disciples said to Paul, through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem. The apostle had before experienced what seemed, at first sight, contradictory guidance. He knew how to refer difficulties to the Lord, without attempting to reason them out himself, and thus he was "led of the Spirit," although very likely he could no more have reduced the guidance he understood to a science than we can. He had purposed in the Spirit to go to Jerusalem, and had testified that he went bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem; now disciples said to him through the Spirit, that he should not go there. From Tyre the travelers came to Ptolemais, where they spent one day with the brethren, necessarily unannounced, but doubtless one of conference, prayer and praise.

From Tyre they went to Cæsarea: into the house of Philip the evangelist. Shortly after his conversion, Paul had been at Cæsarea, and Philip, who had gone to that city when God took him away from the scene of his labors at Samaria (Acts 8:40), was probably well known to him.

Paul was in no hurry to leave Cæsarea: "We tarried there many days." Meanwhile there came down from Judea a prophet named Agabus, who prophesied, warning him not to go to Jerusalem. His friends were moved. Luke, speaking for himself and for them, said, "When we heard these things, both we and they of that place besought him not to go up to Jerusalem." Paul had counted the cost, and was decided. He saw the grace of God to sustain him, while they were looking at the human side.

As soon as they saw he was steadfast in his God, they saw he was in the will of God, and acquiesced, saying, "The will of the Lord be done."

TO BATHE BABY PROPERLY

You need: A portable tin or porcelain bathtub, a washcloth or a piece of flannel, a sponge, a cake of Ivory Soap, a bath thermometer and a couple of very soft towels.

The water should be soft and of a temperature of 95° in winter and from 85° to 90° in summer.

Put baby in the bath. Moisten the washcloth and apply soap, first to the face and neck, then to the arms, next to the body, and last, to the legs and feet. Fill the sponge with water from the tub and squeeze its contents over the face, arms, body and legs, repeating this until all dirt and soap are removed. Dry by "patting"—not rubbing—with the towels. The best hour for baby's bath is ten in the morning, or in the evening, just before he is given his last bottle.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

AMONG THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Temperance*

THE cause of temperance has received a tremendous impetus from the admirable series of articles upon "Alcohol" by Dr. Henry Smith Williams, which has recently appeared in McClure's Magazine. These have now been issued in a book by the Century Company, of New York, and all those interested in the cause of temperance should read it carefully.

The style in which these chapters are written is dispassionate, and their temper is scientific. From the highest authorities in this and in other countries Dr. Williams proves that the use of alcohol, even in small quantities, produces not only functional disturbance but structural degeneration. Experiment after experiment is deduced, indicating plainly that ultimately decreased power attends always upon the use of alcohol. A temporary stimulation is often experienced from it, but this is likely to be attended by a structural or organic deterioration, which makes such stimulation, in most cases, far too dearly purchased.

The distinguished chemists and physicists, Schnyder and Dubois, performed, some years ago, experiments upon the muscle of the index finger of the right hand, in order to test the effect of alcohol upon the human muscles. Three kinds of tests were applied. Ten single experiments were taken on ten different days. They showed conclusively that alcohol did not begin to compare with plain nutritious food, taken without wine or beer, as an aid to efficiency.

Two experiments were then tried to discover the effect of food, when accompanied with alcohol. The drink taken was a glass of good Bordeaux wine. Unequivocal proof resulted that eight per cent. of efficiency was lost by taking wine with food.

Professor Atwater's famous experiments in this direction at Middletown University indicate clearly that alcohol is a food. That is, it is consumed by the body and produces a certain amount of energy. These newer experiments have shown that the body will not transmute alcohol into force, if it can have food instead. Professor Atwater has cautioned the readers of his valuable tables that they must not forget, while thinking of alcohol as surely a form of food, that it is also a drug. "At best, it is a very expensive source of nutriment, and its action as a drug," he says, "may far more than counterbalance its nutritive effect."

Kraepelin and Kurz, two of the profound and patient Germans who have made deep researches into this subject, have proven conclusively that the effect of alcohol upon the mind is as disastrous as upon the muscles.

Experiments were tried by them in adding numbers, in associating ideas and in memorizing. Roughly estimating the results: after twenty-seven days a loss in adding power was noted of 15 per cent.; of power in freely associating ideas, 27 per cent.; in memorizing, 6 per cent. In each case the effect of the alcohol was found to be strikingly cumulative, the later days adding far more than their due share to the total loss.

A degenerate, who has accustomed himself to work only upon alcohol, of course becomes almost helpless without it. These experiments are designed to show its effect upon a normal, healthy man. As such, though necessarily slightly imperfect, from the entrance into the problem of factors inseparable from a living, complicated organism, they are conclusive and highly instructive.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, September 12. TEXT: I. Cor. 9: 23-27.

The Source of Power*

IN these days of electricity, a clearer idea than ever before can be gained of the importance of a direct connection with the source of power. The trolley-pole slips from its wire. The car stops. It will not move again until the conductor readjusts the pole. The instant that that is done the broken circuit is completed, and as if by magic the car resumes its progress.

It is a vivid illustration of the life of the Christian. If we are in constant communion with Christ, we move onward and upward steadily. The moment that our hearts forsake him, all such progress stops.

Does a Christian become cold, irregular in attendance upon church, careless of the conversion of others? You know that he has lost his hold of Christ. Does he resume his interest in Christian work, begin to go to church again, labor to bring souls into the kingdon? Then it is as sure as truth itself that he has re-established his connection with the divine source of all light and power.

In Gipsy Smith's affecting sermon on this subject he dwells much upon the difference between "thronging Jesus" and "touching" him. A multitude was "thronging" him, as the disciples said. They were crowding around him from curiosity; from a desire to feel the excitement which they had heard that he created; from many other motives; but this woman, with faith to believe that what he had done for others he could and would do for her, gave his garment the touch which went to his very soul and drew from it the healing benediction.

Samuel Chadwick, the great English preacher, once held a series of meetings in London. At one of these a note was sent up to him before the sermon. It was signed by several prominent Socialists, who were also atheists and agnostics, and read: "Do not preach us a sermon; simply tell us frankly and simply why you believe in Jesus Christ." He did so, and they remained until two o'clock in the morning, discussing with him. When they rose to go, he said, "You have propounded a system of philosophy. This system requires a high standard of mind and character for its appreciation. You have said nothing of the millions who do not reach that standard. You know that in this city alone there are thousands of men who have lost their manhood, whose tastes are depraved, whose wills are destroyed—the despair of civilization. What will you do with these?"

The chief agnostic laughed. "I would," said he, "make you a present of the lot." Then he added, more seriously, "I am free to confess that, if there is any hope for such men, it must be in the Christ you preach."

"Every religion," says Dr. Banks, commenting upon this incident, "must be judged by its power to heal the crippled and lost. A religion that has no Saviour in it is useless for this world."

George Matheson speaks of the touch which we all are permitted to give, and which brings forth a blessing upon us, and in one of his beautiful prayers cries, "Jesus, I have read of a woman who touched the hem of thy garment; we call it the touch of faith. But thou hast a touch for the hem of our garment, and this is also a touch of faith. It is a touching of that which is still impure, and it is prompted by a faith in my possibilities. Just as I am—unhealed, uncleansed—thou touchest the hem of my soiled garment, and thy voice says to my soul, 'Take another chance; come and try once more.' O Jesus, great is thy faith."

By touching Him, we approach where he may touch us, and thus impart a double blessing.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXXI—Continued

THE girl laughed in relief. "Now that you've left the cobwebby past and brought matters down to every-day light," she rejoined brightly, "I don't mind owning up that I feel as if I had met you somewhere, too."

"Good! Suppose we compare notes, then. Let us begin with eight years ago, as long as you're so positive that you were unkind enough to keep yourself out of my sight before that."

"We will," agreed the girl, promptly. "I've been abroad twice since then and, of course, somewhere we must have met over there, for you certainly haven't been back here. 'Ill begin with my first trip, and I'll tell you where I went and when; then we can trace this fugitive impression to its lair." And she launched into a minute description of her travels.

The "fugitive impression," however, refused to be captured, and neither she nor Marco Covino was any nearer the solution of their puzzle when the guests, now greatly increased in numbers, began to find their way to the music-room.

The man, playing his violin in the alcove a little later, did not play to the moon and the stars this time. He played to a beautiful girl, fair-haired and starry-eyed, who was in the room before him, he well knew, though he could not see her. As for the girl—into her eyes had come again the puzzled questioning—and to her ears the music was singing, now sadly, now triumphantly:

You were an Egyptian princess, and I——

The sentence was never finished, but went back to its endless:

You were an Egyptian princess, and I——

CHAPTER XXXII

PAYING DEBTS

AS time passed it was found that Signor Marco Covino had surprises in store for many people. First, for his manager.

This man had "managed" celebrities before, and thought he was familiar with all forms of capricious vagaries that genius is apt to display. He discovered now that he was not. He was quite used to an artist who peremptorily refused to play, even for twice his usual compensation, at some rich man's bidding, giving as an excuse that he did not feel like it; so he was not surprised when the Signor Covino did that. But he was not used to finding that same artist, on that same day, playing jigs in a hospital for a dozen humpbacked, crooked-legged children—and that is where his artist was found.

It had come about thus:

Marco had been to see his father one day, when he almost ran into a crippled little fellow in the hallway.

"I beg your pardon, sir," stammered the boy, confusedly, yet with unmistakable satisfaction. "It's just that I wanted to see you—and I did, too!"

"To see me? What for? What can I do for you, my lad?"

"Nothin', sir. You've done it. We just wanted to see ye—all of us," he finished, with a flourish of his hands; and Marco suddenly became aware that from a dozen beds and doorways peered as many pairs of eager, boyish eyes. "Ye see, we knew who you was," explained the boy in answer to the man's mystified gaze, "and so we wanted to see you—as long as we couldn't hear you play."

"Hear me play? Why, of course you can hear me play," retorted Marco promptly, with sudden inspiration. "I fancy I can arrange a little matter like that."

Thus it happened that on the very day upon which a certain multi-millionaire was gnawing his mustache with vexation, because even his millions could not buy for him the musical toy of the hour which he so coveted, that same musical toy was causing a score of little twisted feet and legs to beat time to a rollicking "Money Musk," played as "Money Musk" had seldom been played before.

It occurred to Marco after this that there were other hospitals, beside numberless homes and asylums, where frail humanity was debarred from almost every joy. He wondered if perhaps he had not some joy to give them through his violin, and he decided to find out. He found out—and so did his manager.

The manager wept and tore his hair—figuratively. He declared that it was unheard of, preposterous, quixotic, besides being suicidal to the great violinist's art, career and pocketbook. He said many other things, too; but the violinist only smiled inscrutably—and looked up another hospital. After all, the manager was little more than a figurehead, as the contract between them had been drawn by Marco himself, with an eye to his own repugnance to having his actions controlled. The three concerts at which the violinist was to play before the season ended—two in Boston and one in New York—would soon be over; and after that the manager would doubtless shake the dust of the city off his feet and go back to his beloved Paris, leaving Marco alone for his summer vacation. Marco knew this, and was accordingly content.

In Gaylordville, at about this time, there was another surprise. It centred in the little house where the Widow Martin was still trying to get the tin coffeepot full enough of money to take them back to the New Hampshire hills.

Grandpa Joe was long since dead, and Susie had married and gone away. She had come back, though, in widow's weeds, in less than two years; and the Widow Martin now longed, more intensely than ever, for the New Hampshire hills, for the sake of Baby Sue, Susie's little girl. Of the boys, Johnnie was still there, thin-faced, stoop-shouldered and old before his time; but Benny was gone. Benny went down into the mine one day—and did not come back. The Widow Martin thought of this sometimes when she watched her last-born start for his work in the morning. At such times she was apt to take down the tin coffeepot and count its wealth; she would like the New Hampshire hills for Johnnie, too. The doctor said that before long disease would kill him, if the mines did not.

It was into this household that the surprise came. The surprise took the shape of a wonderful being, who looked like a man, but who was in reality an angel, according to all the stories that the Martins told afterward.

This angel appeared one day among them and calmly announced that he long ago owed them eight dollars and forty cents, and that this eight dollars and forty cents had been accumulating interest all these years. Interest, he said, was a marvelous thing; it grew wonderfully, but he had come now prepared to pay. And he placed upon the table the eight dollars and forty cents, and with it such a stupendous sum of money that the entire Martin family could do nothing the whole evening but hover over it and count it at regular

The Best Book On 6% Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation Bonds, based on long experience and intimate knowledge. Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. We want to send you a copy.

In the past 15 years we have sold 70 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation Bonds, without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are the largest dealers in these Reclamation Bonds, and they have become, in late years, our most popular bonds.

Irrigation Bonds are secured by liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The value of the land is often more than four times the loan.

Some are municipal obligations, forming tax liens on the real property located in populous districts.

They are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. Each year, as the loan is reduced, the security back of the rest is increased.

The denominations are $100, $500 and $1,000, so one may invest either little or much.

The interest rate is six per cent. No other large class of bonds, equally well secured, now pays an equal rate.

These bonds are bound to become more and more popular as they become better known. They are the utmost in six per cent. bonds. Please send us this coupon to-day for our free book, so you may know the facts.

THE STORY OF MARCO

intervals, to make sure that they had not, after all, been mistaken.

In the morning they gathered themselves together, picked up their few belongings, and as soon as possible started for the New Hampshire hills. But even after they had reached them, they looked into each other's faces and wondered how it had all happened.

The Martins, however, were not the only ones that had strange visitors during the first few weeks after Marco Covino's arrival in New York. A little hunchback newsman, who had a tiny store near a crowded Third Avenue corner, found himself confronted one day by a slender, smooth-shaven young fellow, dark-haired and dark-eyed.

"Well, well," cried the stranger, holding out a cordial hand, "I've had the chase of my life to locate you—but I've found you at last. How are you?"

Behind the counter the little man's eyes narrowed shrewdly.

"G'wan wid ye! I've seen that game tried once too often, stranger, ter be fooled at my time o' life—only they don't gin'rally take a chap like me."

"Why, Jimmy, don't you know me?"

"Sure, no—Mike," grinned the hunchback. "Come! G'wan now, an' l'ave an honest man to his work."

"But you see I know your name, Jimmy."

"So does half the avenue, ter say nothin' of the cross-streets."

The stranger laughed.

"I thought my job was done when I'd found you, Jimmy, but it seems it's just begun. How's the mother, and the baby-what-was, eight years ago? Been to Mont-Lawn lately?"

The hunchback stared, then he laid both elbows on the counter with slow deliberation.

"Say, who be ye, anyhow?" he demanded.

"If I had my fiddle here I might play you a little tune, and see if you couldn't guess," retorted the man, with a smile.

A dawning comprehension sent a gleam of joyful amazement into the hunchback's eyes.

"Marco! Say, now, you ain't Marco?"

"Why, I thought I was, but—" His words were cut short. With a monkey-like spring the little man had leaped upon the counter, and caught hold of both his hands.

"Why, sure you're Marco! An' a sight fur sore eyes ye are, too! An' so you're back? An' you're lookin' fine, boy. An' ter think I didn't know ye! Say, why didn't ye bring yer fiddle an' play us a tune? 'Twould 'a' been a good joke. Mebbe ye don't play, though, now; eh?"

"Oh, yes, I play—," rejoined Marco, quietly. "By the way, I brought you in a couple of concert tickets for to-morrow night. You see I remembered you liked music, and I thought you might like to go to this," he concluded, handing out two oblong slips of thin pasteboard which, had Jimmy but known it, might have been at that moment worth their weight in gold to certain disappointed, would-be ticket-buyers over on the avenue, who had just been told that the house was "all sold out a week ago."

"Thank ye," murmured Jimmy, somewhat doubtfully receiving the oblong slips. "Course, I don't git away much, though I've got a man ter help me," he added, with a jerk of his thumb toward a red-headed boy who was selling papers at the other counter; "but Katy—she's the baby-what-was, ye know; she's 'most nine now—she likes music somethin' awful, an' I'll take her. Thank ye; I'll go."

"I don't think you'll be sorry if you do," smiled the man; then he asked with apparent casuality, "How is it—business pretty good?"

A quick cloud crossed the hunchback's face.

"Yes; an' 'twould be better if I had money an' room ter branch out. I been savin, but I can't git much ahead. Ye see, there's mother, she ain't well; an' Katy's got ter have some schoolin'. I'd hoped ter do somethin' han'some by Katy, an' make a lady of her; but I don't know as I can git to it 'fore she gits old an' gray-headed. But tell me about yourself."

"Oh, that will keep until another time," Marco laughed, as he turned away. "I shall have to go now; but—you'll see me again soon. Don't forget the concert to-morrow night, you know."

"I won't. Katy won't let me, anyhow, if she once gits her eyes on them tickets!"

As it happened, Katy "got her eyes on them tickets" very soon, for she came into the store on an errand; and after that there was certainly little chance of Jimmy's forgetting the concert.

There were those in the great audience, assembled to hear the famous young violinist play in his second concert the next night, who wondered just how it happened that two of the best seats in the front row of the first balcony were occupied by an insignificant little hunchback and a pale-faced, poorly-dressed little girl. The couple were neat and respectable looking, to be sure; but they certainly did seem a bit out of place in the richly-dressed throng that filled every seat and crowded every available bit of standing-room.

The hunchback himself acted nervous and fingered his programme restlessly, gazing at it with curious eyes. Then suddenly he gave a start.

"Say, Katy," he whispered hoarsely, "there's a chap what's put down here on this 'ere paper as one o' the preformers, an' his name is 'Sig-nor Marco Covino.' Now, our Marco's name is 'Covino,' though I'd 'most forgot it till now. Ye don't s'pose—but, then, it couldn't be! Our Marco wouldn't be playin' here 'fore all this swell crowd."

"'Course not," murmured Katy, her awe-struck eyes devouring the glitter and sparkle all about her.

"'Course not," echoed the man, falling back in his seat. But that he was not quite satisfied was shown a moment later when he hesitatingly nudged the arm of his neighbor on the other side—a very fleshy woman, resplendent in jet paillettes and diamonds.

"I beg pardon, ma'am," he began humbly, "but I heard ye talkin' about this 'ere Marco Covino"—tapping his programme—"and I jest wanted to ask ye is he a slim, quiet-spoken chap in a gray suit, with——"

"Signor Covino is one of the greatest violinists living," coldly interrupted she of the black paillettes and diamonds. "Surely, any one who has come to hear him play should know that." And she turned severely back to her programme.

"Yes m'm. Thank ye. I knew, 'course, 'twa'n't the same one," murmured the hunchback, apologetically, as he subsided in some confusion.

Friends Together in Christ*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

PAUL was now among his friends. Seven of them, as we have learned, were on the ship with him, accompanying him on his journey to Jerusalem. And then there was the host of friends who came from Ephesus to Miletus to be with Paul while the ship's business demanded time. The next landing made by the ship was at the island of Cos, forty miles from Miletus.

Fifty miles farther on they came to Rhodes. But Rhodes was even then in ruins, the result of an earthquake. The third port was Patma, opposite the island of Rhodes. It was the seaport of the great city of Lycia, only ten miles distant. If there had been a church in Lycia, the elders might have come to see Paul, as did those of Ephesus. But there was no Christian church in Lycia, the people being wholly given over to the worship of Apollo. They were now to cross the broad Mediterranean Sea, so they left the small coasting vessel and took passage in a large merchant ship. Sailing along by the southern shore of Cyprus, they came on the fourth day to the great city of Tyre, and there they remained seven days, detained by the ship's business. There Paul found friends, "disciples," for as far back as the times of David and Solomon there had been friendly relations between the people of Tyre and the Israelites. And then the Lord Jesus himself had visited the borders of Tyre; possibly he may have gone into the city. He had cured the little daughter of the woman who lived in that region. As Paul knew there must be "disciples" in Tyre, he proceeded on landing to discover them. As they reached Tyre on the Sabbath, May 7, A.D. 57, they went at once to a synagogue, knowing that there they should find the followers of the true and living God. There is just one little sentence, or part of a sentence, that shows us what kind of friends Paul found at Tyre; they urged him that "he should not go up to Jerusalem." And they thought they were being led of the Spirit of God in giving such advice. They could not, therefore, be called false friends, but their words show us that friends are not infallible. They mistook their own tender solicitude for the voice of the Spirit. Paul knew himself, through the witness of the Spirit, that God expected him to go to Jerusalem. Did Paul break with them because they did not think as he did? From the sequel we know that he did not; for, after seven days, when they were about to continue their journey, men, women and children gathered about them in God's temple by the sea, which had the sand for a floor, the blue sky for the ceiling and the roar of the waves for the organ, and there they knelt and prayed that God would bring them safely on their journey. How differently would that visit to Tyre have ended if Paul had been of the same mind as a certain politician of these modern times, who said:

"Young man, let me give you a piece of advice: never trust a coward. He may be your most intimate friend, he may love you and admire you, he may be intensely loyal, he may be above reproach in his friendship for you; but don't trust him, for sooner or later he will betray you. Never put him on the outpost; never put him in a position of responsibility, no matter what his ability may be; for some time or other he will fail you, will go back on you."

*The International Sunday School Lesson for September 12. Paul's Last Journey to Jerusalem. Acts 21 : 1-17. GOLDEN TEXT: "The will of the Lord be done." Acts 21 : 14.

The next day, after leaving Tyre, the good ship brought Paul and his fellow-voyagers to Ptolemais, and there Paul found friends, "brethren." We are not told what was said and done, but only that Paul and his company remained "one day." How impossible to count the blessings that have been crowded into even so short a space of time when friend has found fellowship with friend! At Ptolemais Paul and his friends left the ship to go overland to Cæsarea. And there Paul found Christian hospitality waiting for him in the home of Philip. It was certainly a godly family, because the four daughters of Philip were teachers of the Word of God. Paul remained in Cæsarea for ten days, and the only incident recorded as being inharmonious was the visit of the prophet Agabus, from some place outside of Cæsarea. He, like the friends at Tyre, tried to persuade Paul from going on to Jerusalem. He accompanied his expostulation by a spectacular demonstration; he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, to show that Paul would be made a prisoner in Jerusalem. Then even those who were Paul's fellow-voyagers gave way, and joined their demurs with those of Agabus; and it would seem that Philip and his four daughters did the same. Did Paul therefore break friendship with them? Not he; but he did say: "What mean ye to weep, and to break mine heart?" With the joy of having a friend there is always sure to come sorrow and disappointment. Mr. Beecher said: "Every man should keep a fair-sized cemetery, in which to bury the faults of friends." We might add to this: Let every one be willing to concede that he has faults which should be buried, and that some time or another they are sure to be a trial to those who dearly love him.

In the Endeavor World we found these words: "A friend has many functions. He comes as the brightener into our life, to double our joys and halve our griefs. He comes as the counselor, to give wisdom to our plans. He comes as the strengthener, to multiply our opportunities and be hands and feet for us in our absence. But above all use like this he comes as our rebuker, to explain our failures and shame us from our lowness; as our purifier, our uplifter, our ideal, whose life to us is a constant challenge in our heart, 'Friend, come up higher, higher along with me; that you and I may be those truest lovers who are nearest to God when nearest to each other.'"

Paul's Answer to His Unwise Friends

"I am not ready to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." It is said that General Gordon (of the Soudan) feared men so little because he feared God so much. He had a supreme contempt for wealth, for which so many soil their honor and sell their souls; he had a supreme contempt for popularity, for which so many spread every sail of their plausible and shifty lives; he had a supreme contempt of self, which most men idolize; he had a supreme indifference to death, which most men dread; above all, he gave the supreme allegiance of his whole heart and soul to Christ, whom most men honor with their lips while their hearts are far from him. General Gordon was like Paul in true bravery and loyalty.

Paul, by his uncompromising loyalty to God, was able to bring his friends to his standard. It is recorded of him by one who tried to dissuade him: "And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done." They were then indeed

A Judge Commends Pure Food

A Judge of a Colorado Court said:

"Nearly one year ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts as a food. Constant confinement indoors and the monotonous grind of office duties had so weakened and impaired my mental powers that I felt the imperative need of something which neither doctors nor food specialists seemed able to supply.

"A week's use of Grape-Nuts twice each day convinced me that some unusual and marvelous virtue was contained therein. My mental vigor returned with astonishing rapidity; brain weariness (from which I had constantly suffered) quickly disappeared; clearness of thought and intellectual health and activity which I had never previously known were to me the plain results of a few months use of this food.

"Unhesitatingly I commend Grape-Nuts as the most remarkable food preparation which science has ever produced so far as my knowledge and experience extends."

The judge is right. Grape-Nuts food is a certain and remarkable brain builder, and can be relied upon. "There's a reason."

willing that he should go to Jerusalem! We may believe that they loved Paul not less, but all the more, for the rebuke he had given them. He had lifted them higher not only in human friendship, but in the service of God.

Power of Friendship

What might be done if men were wise—
What glorious deeds, my suffering brother,
Would they unite
In love and right,
And cease their scorn of one another.

The meanest wretch that ever trod,
The deepest sunk in guilt and sorrow,
Might stand erect
In self-respect,
And share the teeming world to-morrow.

What might be done? This might me done,
And more than this my suffering brother,
More than the tongue
E'er said or sung,
If men were wise and loved each other.

—CHARLES MACKAY.

So long as we love, we serve; so long as we are loved by others I would almost say we are indispensable; and no man is useless while he has a friend.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Friendship has been called the "master passion," but rather we should say Christ-love is the master passion—the love of Christ toward us, and our love to him. "One Lord had looked on them," that is why Paul and his companions found friends when they stopped for a few hours or a few days on that long journey by sea to Jerusalem.

Here is a sea story that fits well with the lesson: Peter Pearson had always been a troublesome boy. He was quite a terror in the seaport town where he lived, while in his home he was hardly endurable, his parents often threatening to "give him in charge" of a police officer. "He needs a master," thought a young officer who had organized a Boys' Brigade; "I'll try to get hold of him for the Master." Peter responded with unexpected readiness, and when one of his chums came "over the line to Jesus" there seemed hope that Peter might follow his example.

But the effect passed away, and presently Peter fell out of the Boys' Brigade and began to adopt the habits of the godless sailors, whom it was his duty as pilot lad to call together an hour before sailing out of the harbor. One night, as he was looking for a crew, he stuck his head through the half-open door of the Seaman's Mission. A friendly voice asked him to "come in." But Peter shook his head and was about to turn away when his new-found friend shook his hand cordially, and said, "Come again, won't you?"

That kind invitation was the turning point in Peter's life. The very next evening he went again to the mission; again and again he went, taking his seat among those who came to participate in the services. "Have you let Jesus aboard of you, and have you let him get hold of your helm?" This question was asked him after a week or two by the young man who first invited him to "come in." Peter answered, "I can't say he is aboard of me yet, but I mean to make sure that he is before long." He kept his word, and became a Christian. "It is wonderful," he said to the friend who had asked him the question; "how different everything looks now that I'm steering for heaven. I never took much notice of the stars before, when we lie out at night waiting for a ship, but now they seem like angels' eyes, set by my Father to look after me and see all's right. Oh, the whole world seems full of beauty now. I could never have guessed anything like it." Some of his mates were won over to the right side by seeing such a happy fellow sailing under the heavenly Pilot's orders.

IT WORKS

The Laborer Eats Food that Would Wreck an Office Man

Men who are actively engaged at hard work can sometimes eat food that would wreck a man who is more closely confined.

This is illustrated in the following story:

"I was for 12 years clerk in a store working actively and drank coffee all the time without much trouble until after I entered the telegraph service.

"There I got very little exercise and drinking strong coffee, my nerves grew unsteady and my stomach got weak and I was soon a very sick man I quit meat and tobacco and in fact I stopped eating everything which I thought might affect me except coffee, but still my condition grew worse and I was all but a wreck.

"I finally quit coffee and commenced to use Postum a few years ago and I am speaking the truth when I say, my condition commenced to improve immediately and to-day I am well and can eat anything I want without any bad effects, all due to shifting from coffee to Postum.

"I told my wife to-day I believed I could digest a brick if I had a cup of Postum to go with it.

"We make it according to directions boiling it full 20 minutes and use good rich cream and it is certainly delicious."

"CONSIDER THE LILIES"

(Transplanted)

"My beloved has gone down into his garden to gather lilies."—Song of Solomon.

In loving remembrance of Eva, Alice and Miller, by Lu Semans Hadley.

"MY Beloved has gone to His garden" to-day,
"To gather the lilies" so bright,
And with joy He tenderly bears them away,
To bloom in the mansions of light.

"The beautiful lilies are dear to me,"
He cries, as he bears them away;
"I will bear them aloft to my heavenly home,
The earth-winds bring blight and decay."

So He tenderly bears to a fairer clime
The blossoms to us so dear;
Which have brightened our homes for so brief a time,
But we yield them without a fear.

For we know 'tis a loving Father's hand
Transplants the flowers we love;
To eternally bloom in a fairer land,
And we'll find them all above.

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

Reader, Helena, Mont. What has been the comparative increase of farm product values since 1900?

Mr. Copeland, a well-known statistician, gives these figures: In farm products generally the value of the annual production has increased from $3,800,000,000 to $7,800,000,000. In corn the annual value has grown from $800,000,000 to $1,600,000,000; cotton from $516,000,000 to $681,000,000; wheat from $324,000,000 to $617,000,000; oats from $209,000,000 to $381,000,000; barley from $24,000,000 to $92,000,000.

Mrs. C. C. P., Bunker Hill, Ill. What is the meaning of the verse, Col. 2:18?

It means that the Colossians were to be careful that no self-constituted judge or false teacher should draw them away from Christ, and thus make them grasp at the shadow and lose the suhstance. They were specially warned against a mock humility of their own imposing, which was mere formalism and self-pleasing. Angel-worship, too, which was not unknown in those days, was to be guarded against, for none of the inferior powers should share with the Supreme Being our adoration and our prayers. They were also cautioned against following those who pretended to reveal the supernatural and who were puffed up by their "fleshly mind," or human vanity and conceit. These pretenders have their counterpart in the esoterics and mystics of our own day.

J. B., Los Angeles, Calif. Who is the best authority on electrical farming?

Write to the Agriculturist, New York. Probably the best authority is Dr. Hochsherman, who is now conducting experiments for Emperor William, and who declares that cereals, flowers and all kinds of vegetation grow rapidly under electric stimulation. He holds that more abundant crops can be grown and all fertilizers can be done away with by electrical farming.

Mrs. G. W. F., Sutter, Ill. Please explain the latter part of the second commandment: "For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God," etc.

"A jealous God"—one who will brook no rival and who will accept no divided homage. "Visiting the iniquity," etc., means that the effect or influence of a man's sins will be felt hy his posterity. It does not refer to natural evils (although these also entail suffering to posterity), but to the sin of national idolatry, the punishment of which God reserves specially to himself; while, on the other hand, he promises mercy and consideration to those who love him and give him true and loyal service. The whole commandment deals with idolatry and its punishment exclusively.

Morton R., Alton, Ill. What is the difference between a nautical, or sea mile, and a statute mile?

The Hydrographic Office, Washington, D. C., gives this definition: "The American sea, or nautical, mile or knot is 6,080.27 feet; in France, Germany and Austria it has a length of 6,076.23 feet; in England it is 6,080 feet. The geographic mile is 6,087.15 feet long. The statute mile, used in measurements on land, is 5,280 feet."

Mrs. J. W. L., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please explain: 1. Ezek. 18:4; 2. Isa. 33:14; 3. Matt. 18:8, and 4. Matt. 25:4.

1. As Creator, God deals with all according to the principles of equity. It was a warning to the Jews who, sharing in the sins of their fathers and following their example, would also share in their punishment. 2. Fire is a frequent image in describing the divine judgments. The prophet was pointing out that if God has sent his judgments on the wicked heathen, he would even more seriously punish those who, knowing the true God and having religious opportunities, yet deliberately sinned. 3. "Hand" and "foot" and "eye" are here employed as figures of those worldly gifts and possessions which we value most and which we should rather sacrifice than permit them to lead us into sin. 4. There are various interpretations of this passage. The empty lamps are the mere form of godliness without the Spirit; the filled lamps are the consecrated lives, the "inward reality of grace," which finds expression in holy and helpful living, in good deeds, and in constant preparedness for Christ's coming. Besides, the precious anointing oil with which the priests of the temple were consecrated may have been symbolized as a type of the inward spiritual life which marks the believer as Christ's true disciple.

Reader, E. Poultney, Vt. If A has made a will and willed all his property, personal and real, to his wife while she lives, and if any is left at her decease, does it go to the children equally? Has the widow got to keep an account of her expenditures?

Unsafe to answer this question without knowing the exact language of the will. The intention of the testator, as indicated by the wording of the will, may have been to give his wife the right to use the entire principal as well as interest for her maintenance and at her pleasure, in which case no account could be required of her. On the other hand, the will may mean that the wife is not to use the principal at all, or only so much as is necessary to keep her from want, in which case she might have to keep an account.

H. A., Olla, La. 1. I read of many things in the Bible being burned with fire. Is there anything else that burns? 2. I read in Eph. 4:5, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." Is water or Spirit meant? 3. Have not all Protestant churches originated since the Lutheran Reformation?

1. There are other things that burn, although not in the form of fire and smoke. Acids burn and cause combustion; so does electricity, when it ignites particles of matter in its swift passage through the atmosphere. The word "fire" in Scripture is frequently used figuratively, and should be so understood. 2. Baptism is included in this enumeration because in its single celebration and individual reference it symbolizes unity, which is Paul's theme in this chapter. It is "the one and only sacrament whereby we once for all unite with Christ." 3. Protestantism, whose principle is evangelical freedom in Christ, was the outgrowth of the reaction against the tyranny and ecclesiasticism of the mediæval church. It took form and shape at the Reformation. There were, however, evangelical dissenting movements prior to the Reformation, and these were welded into one later, when the movement became general and assumed practical form in Europe.

Suhscriber, Sylvan, Wash. What is the law regarding inheritance tax in Colorado?

In Colorado law, property passing to near relatives, including husband, wife, adopted children and son-in-law or daughter-in-law, pays two per cent., unless the estate is less than $10,000, in which case it is exempt. Property passing to uncles, aunts, nieces or nephews, or their descendants, pays three per cent., with no exemption. In other cases there is a larger tax, depending on size of estate.

W. M., Griswold, Ia. When and where was Paul born, and when did he die?

He was born in Tarsus, in Cilicia, about 6 A.D., and was martyred in Rome, under Nero, about 67 A.D.

Mrs. E. Y. L., Anderson, Ark. Who was "The Gray Champion" referred to in Hawthorne's writings?

He was supposed to be the regicide Goffe, one of the judges of Charles I. He, with Whalley, another regicide, fled first to New Haven and later to Hadley, Mass., where they lived in seclusion. When Indians menaced the town and the whites seemed destitute of a leader, Goffe, wearing a gray cloak, put himself at their head and led them on to victory. Then he disappeared mysteriously, just as he had come. He died at Hadley in 1679.

F. K., Chatham, N. Y. What was the length of the "time" spoken of in Dan. 4:32?

Like many other passages in Daniel, this particular passage has been a subject of controversy, and it is by no means settled. "Seven" may have been used in the sense of completeness, as in many other Scriptural passages. We have a possible clue, however, to the actual duration in the great Nebuchadnezzar inscription which was found, and which apparently relates to the temporary eclipse of that monarch's glory and reason. This inscription, after describing his great works, proceeds: "For four years . . . the seat of my kingdom . . . did not rejoice my heart." It tells of the suspension of all the royal activities—temple building, canal construction, sacrifices to Bel-Merodach, etc. It does not explain the cause of this suspension, but it is fair to conclude that it was the result of the strange malady which Daniel predicted.

C. W. S., Hinden Heights, O. 1. What is the meaning of unclean: Lev. 11:15? 2. Did the devils desire to enter the swine because they are unclean: Luke 8:32? 3. Were those referred to in Lev. 13:15 violators of the law against uncleanliness?

1. Verses 13 to 19 enumerated as unclean the birds that feed on flesh and carrion, of which about twenty species were then known. 2. Probably so; but conjecture on such matters seems useless. 3. Leprosy was not hereditary among the Hebrews; they contracted it from their relations with the Egyptians and from the hardships of their life in bondage. It was of two kinds, benign and malignant, and the passage referred to relates to the latter kind. Your other questions, relative to inherited diseases and microbes, are problems for a practical physician.

W. H., Prairie City, Ill. Why is Rome called the Eternal Ciy?

Rome is one of the oldest cities in the world which have maintained a continuous existence to the present day. It was founded at least eight centuries before Christ. Governments have come and gone, nations have disappeared, but the city of Rome has survived through all changes. It is doubtless this which has led to its receiving the name of the Eternal City. The expression probably started from the verse in the Æneid where Jupiter tells Venus he would give to the Romans an eternal empire.

The photograph shows a young married couple leaving the "Floating Church" after the wedding ceremony. The "Floating Church" is for sailors. In it are celebrated all joyful and sad occasions, funerals and baptisms being mingled with the usual church services. This "Floating Church" changes its anchorage almost every week, going to different places in the Berlin harbor and canals, and in this way affords sailors an opportunity to attend the services.

Mrs. Charles G. Billings, of Malaga, Wash., writes an interesting letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the subject of the Cradle Roll, referred to in a recent issue of this journal. She says that mothers of the infants whose names are on this roll are rarely members of the Sunday School, as they have to stay at home to take care of their little children. They are often not even Christians, but have in many cases been led into the Church by the fact that their children's names have been put on the Cradle Roll and cards sent them on each birthday; and that they have been closely followed up, coming in due course into the primary and then the other departments of the school. Mrs. Billings considers the Cradle Roll as one of the finest missionary branches of the Church.

A Hopi Girl

View of an Old Pueblo Town

OUR NEW NATIONAL PLAYGROUND

By JOHN L. COWAN

THAT the prehistoric cliff dwellers of the Mesa Verde National Park, in southwestern Colorado, had attained a state of culture strikingly similar to that of the Hopi Indians of northern Arizona at the present day, though possibly more advanced, seems to be proven by the researches that have been conducted this summer by Dr. J. W. Fewkes, of the Smithsonian Institution. The Hopis are supposed to be degenerate descendants of the ancient cliff dwellers.

Dr. Fewkes has completed the excavation and repair work on the two most notable of the Mesa Verde ruins, known as the "Spruce Tree House" and the "Cliff Palace." Accumulated dust heaps and debris of ages were removed, and walls were braced, patched or buttressed to save them from further decay. This work has resulted in many interesting discoveries, casting considerable light upon the arts, industries, culture and manner of life of the forgotten people. Twenty-six rooms of the Cliff Palace that had been buried by rubbish and detritus falling from the roof were uncovered and opened, as well as a number of hitherto unsuspected kivas, or circular chambers, used as council rooms and places in which secret religious rites were performed. Scores of other rooms, kivas and storage places, that were filled with rock fragments from fallen walls, have been cleaned out. As the ruined Cliff Palace now stands, it contains 175 rooms and 23 kivas. It may have housed a population of anywhere from 700 to 1,000. The finger-prints of the workmen who applied the mud plaster to the masonry, and the grooves and channels in the rock where they sharpened their tools, are still visible. The mealing bins, in which the women of the households ground their corn, are intact, with metates and all complete, as if they had been used but yesterday; and the walls and ceilings are black with the smoke of fires that were extinguished centuries before the white man set foot upon this continent. Very little pottery and but few portable household utensils, or tools, or implements of any kind were discovered. These have all been carried off by vandals long ago.

As architects and masons, the cliff dwellers were superior to the Hopis of to-day, and to all other aborigines of this continent. Their blocks of stone were cut and dressed with skill and precision, laid with mathematical exactness, plastered with neatness, and in one or two instances ornamented with artistically painted dados. At each of the larger communal "houses" (really compactly built villages) was an elaborate system of fortifications, with stone walls more than two feet thick, and sometimes twenty feet high, and circular watch-towers thirty feet high, having small loopholes for arrows. The cliff men appear to have been conscious of their weakness as fighters, and so built their dwellings in retreats so secure that even the boldest foe would hardly dare attack them.

The prehistoric women of the Mesa Verde wore their hair in whorls, like the girls of marriageable age among the Hopis of to-day. They kindled fire in the same way with fire-board and drill; they worshiped the same personified forces of nature, and used prayer sticks and planting sticks. They were evidently of small stature, as the entrances to their apartments were diminutive, and the few skeletons and mummified bodies found indicate that the people averaged little more than five feet in height.

Dr. Fewkes in the Cliff Palace

In the Mesa Verde region there are from 200 to 300 different ruins, some of which accommodated communities of several hundred, while others could hardly have contained more than a single family. A few of the smaller ruins were discovered by government surveyors about thirty-five years ago; but it was not until in 1886 that the Cliff Palace, Spruce Tree House, Balcony House, and other large and important ruins were found. In the next few years vandals rifled the ruins, tearing down walls and blowing up apartments and towers with dynamite. It is to their pernicious activity, rather than to the wear and tear of ages, that the present dilapidated condition of the cliff houses must be ascribed.

By an act of Congress, approved by President Roosevelt June 29, 1906, the Mesa Verde National Park was created, for the purpose of preserving the ruins from further depredations. A certain amount of repair work was necessary to save them from entire destruction. An appropriation of $2,000 was used in the excavation and repair of the Spruce Tree House and a similar amount on the Cliff Palace. Dr. J. W. Fewkes, of the Smithsonian Institution, was placed in charge of the work. The ruins now, with proper care, will last for centuries with no perceptible deterioration.

Mesa Verde National Park is reached from either Mancos or Dolores, on the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad. The

CHRISTIAN ALTRUISM

TEXT—Rom. 12:4, 5. "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another."

MODERN humanitarianism, undoubtedly the most marked movement of our times, has developed a phrase which sociological writers have made widely current and which expresses what they count highest and best in human life. They call it altruism. In its derivation the word suggests the idea of living for others rather than for ourselves. It is the human substitute for that which is greatest and best in God, love; and the contradiction to that which is worst and basest in man, that is, selfishness. The essential idea of socialism at its best is that the individual is submerged in the community and the whole is more important than any single part. There is, of course, an element of truth in every false system, and the truth attempted and aimed at in this new philosophy is but a shadow of a greater and mightier truth which runs through the whole system of nature and the whole plan of redemption. A modern poet has said:

God never made an independent man;
'Twould mar the concord of his perfect plan.

As we look at this mighty universe, we find that all its myriads of stars and satellites and suns are mutually related by great laws of gravitation; that every atom is held in its place by a principle of cohesion, which keeps together the elements which form at once the ocean, the mountain and the man, and that everything is working together according to a principle of unity and order, so uniform and persistent that a great philosopher has said of it that "order is heaven's first law." The earth needs her attendant moon on the one hand and her mighty sun on the other, and that sun in turn is equally dependent upon the great masses that revolve around his mighty centre. Chemical elements are combined in exact proportion in every form of organized matter, and every object we gaze upon is related in some way to some other object, and all members one of another.

Our Wonderful Bodies

Perhaps there is no created thing that so wonderfully illustrates this principle as the human body. Composed as it is of innumerable elements, nerves, ligaments, muscles, bones, integuments, fluids, functions and vital forces, all these are blended in such perfect order and relationship that they are mutually subservient to each other, and all subject to the one supreme personality which constitutes the man himself, whose will controls each member and function as an organized army that moves at the slightest intimation from the officer in supreme command. The more we study this marvelous organism, the handiwork of the Creator, and the climax of the creation, the more we wonder at its marvelous diversity and unity and feel like saying:

Life is a harp of a thousand strings
And breaks if one be gone;
Strange that a harp of a thousand strings
Should keep in tune so long.

Now this wonderful body has been used by the Holy Spirit in the New Testament as the figure and image of that greater and nobler spiritual organism which Christ is attracting to himself through the plan of redemption and the dispensation of grace as a more perfect and heavenly body of which he is himself the Living Head. This sublime conception was revealed to the apostle Paul, and constitutes one of the great mysteries committed to him to unfold. We are on the highest Scriptural ground, therefore, when we pursue this great theme and endeavor to draw from it some practical lessons appropriate to this occasion and this work.

The Church is the body of Christ, and membership is constituted by union with the Head. His place is fixed according to the plan of the Head, Christ himself. Our connection with the body begins with our connection with the Head. We cannot attach ourselves to the members and be part of the body until we have become united to the head. Every member of the human body must have direct relations with the heart and brain, or it would become but dead flesh and an impediment and parasite rather than a living part. And so the first link in this great spiritual economy is regeneration and union with the Lord Jesus Christ by living faith. That brings us into the body of Christ. Then we become related to the other members of this body by virtue of our relation to the Head. But we must always remember that our relation to the Head is primary and indispensable, and the condition and element of all our other relationships to the members. That is to say, our fellowship with one another as Christians must always be through Christ and in his name. When we try to meet with people and be adjusted to people on the human plane merely, we are almost sure to get wrong. Either the attachment is extreme or the detachment and antagonism are even more extreme. When people try to get on with each other on merely human lines they are very apt to fail, but when we learn to meet people in the Lord and recognize our heavenly relation to them, there is always harmony and blessing. This is the very first principle in connection with the organic Christian life and fellowship, to remember that the essence of the Master's prayer was that they may be one in Us.

Our Diverse Ministries

In the body of Christ the members are characterized by infinite diversity. This is true of the human body, and the apostle carries out the analogy. How absurd it would be if one or two organs monopolized the whole form! A body all ears, or all eyes, or, worst of all, all tongue, would be a monstrosity. Just as human forms and faces differ and the traits of character are equally diverse, so the children of God are infinitely varied in their spiritual gifts, their predominant graces, their callings and situations in life, their places of responsibility and service, and their activities and ministries. One is called to the gentle and silent ministry of the home; another to the lot of patient suffering; another to the strenuous battle of public or business life; another to the ministry of teaching or evangelizing; another to be the wise counselor and successful leader of some great religious movement; and still another to be a silent intercessor in the place of greatest power and prevailing prayer. The gifts that appertain to these ministries are as diverse as the ministries themselves. We are therefore not to try to copy each other, but to draw from Him the equipment and the qualifications which will best fit us for the place to which he has appointed us.

But in these varied places and with these diverse gifts and ministries we are not detached and independent units, but we are members one of another. We have a powerful influence upon each other's character, usefulness and happiness. We have a distinct and solemn responsibility to one another in the line of mutual sympathy, fellowship and helpfulness. This, of course, is regulated by our providential relations to each other and our spiritual leadings. We are fitly framed together by the great Architect and Former of this heavenly body. Our family relations have much to do with our mutual responsibilities and reciprocal influence. Our social relations are a factor in this divine adjustment; our secular callings and the various incidents of our daily life determine to a great extent our mutual obligations and associations. Our personal friendships and fellowships are divinely ordained in order better to fit us for our highest usefulness. Our part is to recognize these interlinkings as divine capacities for mutual helpfulness and divine calls to mutual duty.

Our Spiritual Development

The individual member is affected by the condition of every other member and of the whole body. If we are connected with a church that is dead and worldly, it will depress and distress our spiritual life. If we are associated with Christians who are filled with the Spirit and thoroughly alive to God, we shall be conscious of the stimulating and inspiring atmosphere with which we are surrounded. Just as a great army can move no faster than the slowest companies, so each of us is held back by the general conditions of Christian life in our own day and community to a certain extent. It is true God calls individuals out to higher planes, and bolder protests against special conditions of evil in the community and age, yet these quickened spirits cannot outrun the great mass of their brethren without at least the most earnest endeavors to carry them above the conditions around them and arouse their brethren to the new life which has come to them. There is no doubt that the dead weight of sin and worldly-mindedness which was left as a heritage from the Dark Ages on modern Protestantism has long held back the advance of the more spiritual elements in the church of our times, and we are just breaking loose from these handicaps and beginning to return to the standards and possibilities of the early Church.

God uses us involuntarily in the training of one another in innumerable ways. He associates us with people for the development of qualities in them and in us which could be perfected in no other way. He puts the weak with the strong that the weak may be nourished, strengthened and carried in their frailties and infirmities and that the strong may be taught lessons of patience, forbearance and gentleness which could be learned in no other way. He associates us often with uncongenial natures, that we may be taught to bear and forbear and learn that love which can only be perfectly acquired in the school of trial and suffering. Some day we shall thank God above all other things for the people that have tried us and that at one time we could have wished far enough away from us, but which, like the little diamonds that grind and polish the more precious gems, were indispensable to our spiritual purification and education.

Our Mutual Interdependence

As we are able to follow His leading, the Holy Spirit will lay upon us the special needs and burdens of our brethren and give to us those ministries of sympathy and prayer for which he has placed us in the body. Many Christians are so dull and unresponsive that they never learn this higher service, and would not understand the Spirit's voice if he spake to them. But Spirit-filled Christians are sensitive to the needs of other members of the body and understand what the apostle meant when he said, "Who is weak and I am not weak, who is offended and I burn not?" "Whether one member suffer, all suffer. Whether one is honored all rejoice together." These fellowships of sympathy and prayer are the very arteries, veins and vital fluids of the spiritual body through which the Holy Spirit diffuses his life in every part. We cannot have any higher ministry or holier calling than give ourselves up to be thus used by him in helpful prayer and bring his blessing down upon members of the body with which perhaps we may never have in this world any direct or visible connection. The prophet gives us a very fine picture in Zechariah of a system of golden pipes that carry the living oil from the two trees which represent the heavenly sources of our spiritual life. And as these golden pipes carried the oil of the Holy Ghost to the lamps of God, they continued to burn and shine with steady light and the voice of God explained the heavenly mystery in these simple words, "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts."

This principle of the mutual interdependence of the members of the body of Christ is very far reaching. It connects the church of to-day with the past and with the future. The present generation has inherited the blessings, the lessons and the life of the fathers. Centuries have been necessary to lift Christianity to the plane which it occupies in our day. All the treasures of the scholarship, the faith, the piety, the sacrifice, of past generations are our rich heritage. For us the martyrs bled and died. For us the reformers suffered and triumphed. For us the translators of God's holy Word handed down the imperishable treasures of the Scriptures. For us the revival fires of the ministry of Edwards, Finney, Moody and Whitfield burned on the altars of God. For us the saintly lives of Bengel, McCheyne, Rutherford and Fenelon left their sweet fragrance in the censers of the sanctuary. For us the Christian literature of eighteen centuries has been stored up. And better than all, the types of holy character, victorious faith and noble achievement have blazed the track along which we are to press to yet higher triumphs and attainments. Our boasted age is but the flower of a growth rooted in the past and we are members one of another.

In like manner we have a responsibility for the future as well as a heritage from the past. We shall finish nothing in our little span of life. We are but drops in the great river of God, that shall

THE TOURNAMENT IN THE AIR

M. Paulhan

Curtiss, the American, About to Start

Latham in His Monoplane

M. Bleriot

RHEIMS, one of the most historic cities of France, noted more for its association with things of the past than for those of the present, has suddenly become the Mecca for all who are interested in aerial navigation, and the greatest meeting of aeronauts since ballooning began has been held in one of its suburbs. Over twenty contestants entered the competition. They represented most of the European nations and America, and their machines were of all types from the small monoplane to those whose white, extended wings reminded the spectators of some enormous bird such as are said by scientists to have caused so much trouble both to men and crops, but more especially men, in the early days of the human race.

Rheims has always been an objective point for tourists in the summer time. They come to see the old cathedral, where Joan of Arc saw the fulfilment of her wishes when she saw the Dauphin Charles crowned King of France; and they love to wander about the city's old-world streets, gaze at the Gothic houses and imagine that they are back in the fifteenth century instead of the twentieth. During the past weeks, however, the usual charms of Rheims have been forgotten; the tourists had but one object, and that was to get as early as possible to the aerodrome, on the plains of Bethany, without the city, and see the most famous aeronauts in the world, with the exception of the Wrights, show their mastery of the air. Every available room in the city was taken, so great were the numbers who came to see the competition. One of the surprising developments is that all of the records made by the Wright brothers were broken by several aeronauts. The Wrights are at present in Germany, and it may be that in their exhibition flights before the Kaiser at Berlin they will be able to regain their laurels.

Curtiss, the American aeronaut, on Monday, the 23d inst., made a remarkable flight, exceeding in speed any record yet made. Then his hopes of winning were dashed by Bleriot, the Frenchman who flew across the British Channel. Curtiss tried to do even better, but failed. Paulhan then entered the field, and after flying higher than all others, made what all thought would be the finest endurance flight. Later, however, Hubert Latham sailed in circles over a hundred miles. On August 25 the black flag, which meant "no flight to-day," floated above Rheims, for the wind came in fitful gusts and every little while there was a dash of rain. Paulhan, however, got out his machine and, disregarding the weather conditions, shot away into the air.

People watched him at first with but languid interest, as he had announced that the would fly over thirty-one miles before five in the afternoon.

The wind began to rise, yet ne kept his seat, while the machine swayed, tipping up one way and then the other, as if it were endeavoring to spill the man who was guiding it through space at such terrific speed. At times there would come a lull, and the aeroplane would drive ahead as steadily as a motor car. When the wind would rise again, the watching crowd would thrill with horror, for if the aeroplane capsized nothing could have saved the pilot. Paulhan, however, seemed to enjoy the risk he ran. He would send his machine darting upward and then, shooting low, would come so near the grandstand that he could recognize faces, and waved his cap to those he knew. The French spectators were almost hysterical with excitement, and cheered wildly as he came round the turns. There seemed nothing that the driver of the machine could not do.

At last the gasolene of his engine gave out; he dropped near an automobile, got a fresh supply, rose again in the air and finished his trip before the grandstand. Before he came down for gasolene he had been in the air two hours, forty-three minutes and twenty-four seconds. He had gone eighty-one miles, the longest continuous flight yet made.

Paulhan is an interesting character, and his rise, in more ways than one, has been meteoric. He is but twenty-six. A few years ago he made his living as a tight-rope walker at village fairs. Then he became a mechanic. He won a prize of an aeroplane, given for a small working model, but he had no engine, or the money to buy one. A few friends formed a company, bought him an engine and sent him out to compete.

The next day Hubert Latham astonished every one by sailing over one hundred miles at top speed, only descending because his gasolene gave out. Bleriot, on the same day, met with an accident which ruined his machine. Bleriot had taken a trip, carrying a passenger, in an eighty horse-power monoplane. At the height of thirty feet he sailed about for a few minutes, and then came down at a slant. Bleriot could not stop it, and it crashed into a barrier and turned up, burying the aeronauts under the wreck, but they crawled out unhurt.

The monoplane of Latham is the most birdlike in appearance of all those at Rheims. Latham had had trouble with it, and few thought he would do anything noteworthy.

He started first to circle at sixty feet, then he rose to one hundred, and went on. All seemed well until the sky grew dark and the rain began to fall. The wind increased in violence, blowing twenty miles an hour. All thought Latham would now be compelled to come to earth. Instead of descending, he pointed upward and sailed along three hundred feet above the people; then he went fifty feet higher, where he pointed his aeroplane into the very teeth of the gale, and triumphantly rode out the storm. At times he was lost to view among the low-scudding clouds, then would appear the white wings of the machine, glistening against the blackness of the sky.

When the spectators found he had gone further than Paulhan their enthusiasm knew no bounds. After he had gone a hundred miles, they were awed into silence. In fact, the slightest noise about the field was greeted with murmurs of disapproval. When Latham at last descended, the police had to drive off the crowd, which trampled forward to greet him and shake his hand.

Then came the greatest surprise of the tournament. On the last day an English contestant, Farman, in a biplane, made a flight of one hundred and eleven miles. G. H. Curtiss, an American, won the Speed Cup, having covered the course at forty-eight miles an hour.

CHRISTIAN ALTRUISM — Sermon by Rev. A. B. Simpson

still sweep on when we have passed to the silent sea. We are but battalions in the great army that still will be marching when we have fallen out of the ranks and others take our place. David had to learn the humbling lesson, "One soweth, and another reapeth," and to be glad to contribute to the building of that temple which the hands of another would rear, although his heart had planned it and laid its foundations. How sublime is this great thought of the perpetuity of the body, the immortal life of the whole, the undying and eternal destiny of the Church of the living God! Let us be glad that we have a part in it. Let us accept the precious heritage bequeathed to us, and let us pass on a richer and better endowment to those who shall finish our work.

It follows from this mighty fellowship that the Church of God must be larger than any private interest, any family fellowship, any denominational lines, any particular congregation or any national exclusiveness. Its spirit must be as large as its living Head. While there is a place for the loved ones of our home in our Christian zeal and effort, while we are to be loyal to our parish and the larger fellowship of churches with which we may be more particularly related, and while the Christian should be a patriot and should love and work for the spiritual good of the land he calls his own, yet the body of Christ is neither American, nor Saxon, nor Teuton, nor Hebrew, but a great composite picture, with the features of every race and the life-blood of every land. And if we truly possess the heart of the Head we shall love every member of the body and shall throb with sympathy, prayer and fellowship as we cherish the welfare and keep in touch with the progress of the Church of God of every name and place and race.

It follows from this that the true church must be a missionary church, and recognize the vital bond between what we ordinarily call home work and foreign missions. Indeed, if the conception of the unity of the church were fully realized, there would be no home or foreign missions, but all the world would be one in thought and scope of the one body and of Christ. But for all practical purposes there is a distinction, and it is the fatal deficiency of present-day Christianity that it is maintaining a struggle for questions and forgetting the duty of expansion.

As members one of another we must learn to recognize and rejoice in the work of others. There is no place for jealousy, criticism and envy. Your brother's work is yours. It is one of the finest tests of true sanctification to be able to see another used and honored of God and take the same delight in it as we would in our own personal ministry. This suggests also the mutual relation of the contributor and the active worker. You may not be used to stand on the fire line and carry the battle to the gate, but rather used to keep up the supplies and sustain the sinews of this holy war by your gifts and sacrifices. But some day God will count this just as much missionary work as if you had struggled to learn a foreign language and told the heathen in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

The highest of all mutual fellowships and copartnership is prayer. Only the Holy Spirit can teach the true ministry of prayer. And when he does truly it makes us members one of another. There is no mystery more profound and no ministry more precious than to be so brought into conscious fellowship with some suffering child of God, or some ransomed or struggling worker, that we feel his burden more keenly than any of our own, and it becomes a perfect relief and luxury to pray through some real crisis, some perilous conflict, and then rejoice in the blessed consciousness the Spirit gives us that unspeakable blessing has come to that tested one, and an equal blessing pours back into our own full hearts.

How We Fought the Black Famine

A Personal Reminiscence of the Greatest Relief Work the World Has Ever Known Supplies Going Overland by Ox Cart

Winter Relief Work Along the Small Yellow River

By OLIVER BURGESS, C. I. M.

SHANGHAI, CHINA

THE Tai-Ping rebellion, two Moslem revolts, insurrections of the secret societies, the British, French, Japanese and Boxer wars, the Shen-Si famine, the flood of the Yellow River and the more recent famine in Kiang-Su all tend to prove that the hand of God has hung heavily upon China for its idolatries.

Let me review the facts connected with the last great famine of 1907. Through incessant rain and floods, the network of canals in Kiang-Su failed to hold and drain off the excessive quantities of water, consequently it burst through and over the banks, and devastated vast regions of low-lying, densely populated country. Unnumbered souls were drowned, mud-made huts and homes washed away, growing summer crops destroyed, cattle and fowls lost, domestic and farming utensils and implements immersed beyond recovery.

As the waters receded, the people descended from the roofs of their dwellings, cattle-sheds and trees, improvised boats and rafts, and floated over the inundated fields to glean the unripe corn peeping above the water. The family wheelbarrow, cooking pots and sheets of matting were next collected, and the great exodus commenced. Roughly, a million men were moving along the embankments above the flood toward the wealthy cities, half that number alone encamping at Tsing-kiang-pu, and death reaped a mighty harvest among them.

Government generosity was utterly inadequate to feed and sustain such masses for any length of time, and at this juncture practical Christian charity saved the lives and relieved the suffering of many thousands of Chinese.

Urgent appeals for funds and food from travelers and missionaries met with a liberal response, the circle of sympathy expanded from port to port, and men of every class and nation assisted to feed the very people who were killing their kith and kin in the Boxer massacres a few years ago. National contributions were collected, and Mr. Roosevelt publicly solicited supplies for the starving people. The Central Committee of Shanghai, the Red Cross Society of America, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, and the China Inland Mission became the four great channels through which funds and food were poured into the famine area for long consecutive months. Labor equaling the provisioning of an army through a campaign was accomplished during that period.

The bulk of flour, corn, wheat, millet and seed was shipped from America, Australia and Mongolia; telephone, wire and steam were utilized to tap the nearest markets in the world; but it was found that we could buy, ship and distribute with more dispatch from over-seas than we could from distant provinces of China. The defective waterways of Kiang-Su, which were primarily the cause of the catastrophe, ultimately served the commissariat as prompt and ready channels for transport and distribution.

Missionaries and Officials Who Worked to Relieve the Famine

After distributing food for a month in the flooded district of Hwai-An, the writer passed over to take charge of relief measures in the centre of the famine at An-Tung. We found a flooded, foodless city, and 100,000 people existing upon garbage; without work, wage or strength, and burdened with hopeless despair; but in a few weeks the aspect was changed. The place became a centre of activity, and a human Niagara of noise; hungry, sullen men were enrolled in brigades and disciplined to support themselves and families. They carried thousands of tons of earth into the city, made miles of roads, dug leagues of drains and canals, built bridges, locks and viaducts, released the bottled waters and rescued their habitations from the flood. Previously, food was unprocurable; but the arrival of American flour allowed a daily distribution of four pounds to each of the 12,000 men employed. The monetary grants from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee at Chin-Kiang and Shanghai were converted into copper coins, with which we paid the men for each load as they passed the pay tables, or by piece work on the canals. In our busiest days we had over a million coins on the premises, and our payments for wages amounted to $2,000 and a sale of 2,000 bags of flour per day.

Contrary to the views of the Chinese engineers and geomancers, we planned and dug an entirely new canal, with a length of five miles, from the city to the Salt River, large and deep enough for boat traffic, which not only carried off the remaining flood but carried off a few old bridges also, to the consternation of the gentry. The loss of life through flood and famine can never be accurately estimated; according to the official records of An-Tung, 30,000 people perished in that county alone. If a score of counties suffered at a corresponding ratio, the loss of life was considerable.

The usual sights and sounds of famine met the eye and ear throughout these months. The famine wail, the demented moan, the cries of the dying, the skeleton dead; bodies devoured by dogs, bundles of baby bones in every pool of water, and victims succumbing daily in every temple court and city door. We had to gather and bury twenty coolie loads of skeleton remains from one plot of ground before commencing a roadway there!

During the earlier stages of relief work, when funds and supplies were limited, our lives were in constant danger through the hunger and stupidity of overwhelming numbers of unemployed, who threatened us with violence for not feeding them. There was a thrilling scene of excitement among thousands of despairing, emaciated peasants when they beheld a convoy of barrows laden with flour emerge from the river side and wend toward the city. The stoic stolidity of their natures gave place to a delirious joy, and a thunder shout of gratitude rent the air. It was a battle shout of victory over famine and death.

"After all, the Ruler of heaven does care for us," was their heartfelt cry.

We wish it had been possible to have captured that sound and painted that scene, and sent it over the ocean to the great congregation of CHRISTIAN HERALD contributors who sent the food! One evening Mr. Chang, an An-Tung official, saw our family of 10,000 men scattered in groups over the temple grounds, dividing their flour. He was greatly affected, and burst into uncontrollable sobs, saying: "What is it? Flour! Flour for all! Oh, my poor people!" Then, recovering calmness, he said: "Mr. Burgess, I do thank you, and all the kind foreigners,

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

The Bishop of Adana

Captain C. S. Zaras

Mrs. E. F. Young

Senor Maura

ONE of the longest sentences in history has been decreed by the Turkish authorities in Adana, who have ordered the imprisonment for one hundred and one years of the Armenian Bishop Mushegh. As the Bishop escaped to Egypt before the sentence was passed, he is not liable to suffer from the decree, except that it prevents him from living among his own people and ministering to their welfare.

He had been Bishop for a number of years when he foresaw signs of coming trouble—a growing desire on the part of the Turks to make way with the lives and goods of the Armenians. The Bishop remembered the dark days of 1895, which filled the entire world with horror over the blood shed by the ferocious followers of the star and crescent. He warned the officials that another outbreak of the lower classes could be expected from the information he had received, but they paid no attention; in fact, they probably were not displeased at the idea of another massacre of the helpless Armenians.

He therefore urged the Armenians to arm themselves and sell their lives as dearly as possible when they were wantonly attacked.

The Bishop's forebodings proved true, and the massacre of a few weeks ago is still fresh in all minds. The Bishop fled for his life, and managed to escape to Egypt in disguise. The Turkish officials made the baseless charge against him that he had incited rebellion against the government, and the sentence of over a century was passed upon him. An appeal has been made to the Patriarch at Constantinople, and it is thought he may be able to have it modified so that the Bishop may return to his own people.

SENOR MAURA is the Premier of Spain, who has been playing an historic part in the recent troubles at home, and in the endeavors of his government to save the colonies in Morocco from the assaults of the Moors. While the King is absent from Madrid, Señor Maura is the real ruler of the country. He has had a brief respite in Morocco, for the Sultan has ordered the troublesome tribesmen to cease fighting until his commissioners can come and consider their case against Spain.

ONE of the most picturesque and interesting workers at present in America is Captain C. S. Zaras, a Greek. He is an active Christian Endeavorer, and has done much to advance the growth of that society in foreign lands. Captain Zaras was born on the island of Corfu, but moved early to Athens. He began to preach in the streets and gave testimony of his conversion wherever possible. When the war with Turkey broke out he enlisted and fought until peace was declared.

He worked for a time under the United Presbyterian Mission in Egypt. He accompanied the army of Kitchener on its march to Khartoum. His last work in Europe was in Crete. He met with great success among the Greeks, and fifty-seven Mohammedans became Christians and were baptized. The British soldiers were his friends, and at a meeting of farewell presented him a testimonial and a gold watch and chain. The captain at present is trying to uplift his fellow-countrymen who have come to make their home in the United States. He also preaches in American churches and addresses societies whenever opportunity offers.

WOMEN have long furnished the greater part of the army of teachers to whom the education of the hundreds of thousands of children in the American public schools has been confided. The office of superintendent in most cities and towns, however, has almost invariably been filled by some one of the sterner sex. Chicago has reversed the usual rule, and has elected a woman as Superintendent of Public Instruction. Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, who was the choice of the school board over a large number of well qualified candidates, is one of the most experienced school teachers in the country, having instructed her first class nearly fifty years ago, and has been in educational work ever since.

HOW WE FOUGHT THE BLACK FAMINE

for all the labor and generosity bestowed upon my starving countrymen."

The gentry computed, and the native press reported, that our relief work, with its affiliated branches for supplies of rope, tools, baskets, timber and grass shoes, supported 100,000 people, and the death rate decreased considerably as the supplies reached an ever-increasing number of homes. We commenced with the first United States troopship distribution of 1,000 bags of flour and ended with a grant from the Buford's cargo of 40,000 bags of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour. An early grant of $1,000 sufficed to pay the men's wages for one week; latterly we used $2,000 per day.

The enrolment of men rapidly increased from 200 to 12,000, and this mass of men tramped and toiled in sun and shower, from dawn till dark, for many months without riot, accident or the loss of a single working day. The authorities distributed $600,000 in An-Tung, and twenty people were crushed to death in doing so. We used $113,000, and made a work with it which will serve as a channel of safety in future floods.

Funds from foreign sources exceeded the Chinese government and private subscriptions, and the foreign organization and administration of a gigantic scheme of relief was more effective, thorough and lasting than any plan attempted by the officials. Referring to this matter, one official said:

"Frankly, we could not do it; we are not disciplined to consistent and continual efforts ourselves, and we have no honest men."

In An-Tung, the assistance rendered by the Christians was invaluable. They presided at the pay tables through all kinds of weather for months, and showed good qualities of patience, firmness and tact in dealing with the conglomerated crowd of carriers who passed and repassed the tables in 120,000 journeys each day. The flour depot engaged the services of sixty "jolly millers," who were as white as snow by nightfall. Groups of carpenters, bricklayers, masons, tree-planters, water-wheel men, balers, drainmen and widows were employed. It is comparatively easy to run a machine when the component parts are all fixed in position; but the fixing is often a patient and laborious task; and so with this human machine of ravenous, untrained Celestials. The trials and difficulties of enlisting and instructing a few thousand natives to work with regularity and precision were not a few; but time and practice, with many ablutions of cold water over their forgetful heads, served to remove their propensity to mobbing and disorder.

A Memorial Tablet of Thanks for the Relief Work

The march of the shovel-brigade of diggers—8,000 strong—into the city each evening was an interesting sight; the line of men extended over a mile, each man carrying a tool over his shoulder. We commenced by training a few hundred men to come and go in two files, through the narrow streets and gates of the city, and ended with a veteran company of 4,000 running on one route. We paid all the wages ourselves, and did not entrust this duty to the gentry. The men rested on Sunday, and greatly appreciated a day of relaxation from their labors. The church services were crowded, and we could have gathered 10,000 workmen to hear the Gospel, but we had no helpers to preach to them.

Stone tablets have been erected in many parts of the district to commemorate the foreign relief. Officials and gentry signified their gratefulness and appreciation by presenting gold-lettered slabs as testimonials to the mission stations, and silk banners, suitably inscribed, were offered to individual workers as mementos of the recipients' gratitude.

Two missionaries, two doctors and a number of native Christians laid down their lives in the relief work, and others who bore the long strain suffered with famine fever afterward.

It is good to know that quite a number are inquiring the way of life, the outcome of the relief works, and to know that the American missions are preparing to follow up the good impressions made by increasing their staff and stations in Kiang-Su. May we not pray and believe that He who is full of compassion will bless and save the souls of many of those who were preserved alive throughout this great famine?

A Doubtful Triumph

IT would have been wiser and more deserving of public confidence had the National Food Association Convention, at Denver, adopted a different method of dealing with Dr. Harvey W. Wiley and the benzoate of soda issue. As head of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, Dr. Wiley has rendered valuable public service in the cause of pure food and the prevention of wholesale drugging and adulteration. In his scientific experiments to determine the effects of certain chemical preservatives, he reached conclusions which were of the highest importance to the people, and these were endorsed by the National Food Association a year ago. In revoking that endorsement, this year's convention has not settled the question by any means. Public interest will simply be whetted to the point of demanding all the light possible on the question of the use of drugs as food preservatives. Moreover, if the results of Dr. Wiley's patient expert investigations are to be set aside in this indifferent way, such lax methods will be an open invitation to the proprietors of food preservatives which have been officially rejected to renew the effort to have their dangerous chemical concoctions reconsidered and adopted.

If Dr. Wiley is to continue the crusade, as he intimates, we hope he will make it an open one, so that both sides may have the benefit of the greatest publicity possible.

Heroes of Peace

WE often hear the complaint made by the romantically inclined that this is a prosaic age, that the days of chivalric deeds have gone forever, and we must look backward for things that inspire the mind with high ideals, to heroic acts where self is forgotten. Is this true? We hardly think so. Physical courage is tried in another way, perhaps, than in the days when knights had a blacksmith for a tailor; but the demand for courage is as great as ever, and it is just as necessary in this twentieth century as it was in the fifteenth. The conquerors of the wilderness, the searchers for the poles, the aeronauts at Rheims, and the heroes of every land who have saved from fire and flood are refutation enough of the claim that the day of opportunity for those who would perform some deed of daring has gone by.

If this country had a Legion of Honor, its roster could have been filled in the last few weeks. One dispatch brings word that a boy, scarcely in his teens, saves three others from a watery grave, and then tried to conceal his own identity. At Newport, R. I., Ida Lewis, keeper of the Lime Rock Lighthouse, put to sea in a rowboat, at the height of a storm, and saved five girls, drifting oceanward in an open boat. Saving lives is almost chronic with this heroic woman of sixty-eight. She had already rescued eighteen persons during her career. Only a few days ago Engineer Andrew Horn, of Jersey City, at the throttle of his engine, was struck in the eye with a piece of flying glass. The sight of one eye was extinguished instantly, but despite the pain the intrepid engineer stuck to his post and brought in his train safely, and then went to the hospital. Only a few incidents passing under the eye of a reader of any paper. There are, every day, heroes on every side of us, and this is as heroic an age as any other.

The Support of the Gospel

A READER of this paper in Santa Rosa, Calif., writes that a so-called religious sect has recently appeared in that State whose leaders are making a crusade against the Christian churches, alleging that they "have departed from God's true church," and also holding that Christ's followers should not be arrayed in denominational lines, but should all believe the Scriptures; in other words, believe as this particular sect believes. This is merely one of many similar movements which have risen from time to time in recent years, and have passed away after an ephemeral existence. One of the more specific charges which this sect is disseminating is leveled against preachers of the Gospel generally, because they take up "so many collections, when Jesus sent his disciples forth without silver, or gold, or brass, or wallet, neither two coats, nor shoes."

Collections for church purposes are almost as old as religion itself. From the earliest times the Jewish people were enjoined to contribute toward the support of the temple and the priests, and they did so with a generous liberality which has been the marvel of the civilized world ever since. At the opening of the Christian era, the early Christian churches were extremely poor and straitened in circumstances. They confronted oppression on every side. Yet, after the first period of itinerancy, wherever a church was organized, the necessity of providing for its obvious needs was recognized. That Paul himself took an active part in such collections is made very clear from several well-known passages. Special effort was made to raise money for the poor, for the needs of the church, for the equipment and support of its preachers, and for Gospel propaganda generally, and the evidence goes to show that in those days the people gave according to their means. Special days were set apart for particular collections. Moreover, that the system of collection was well organized is also made clear. Stephen was appointed a deacon to have charge of the collections for the poor. Contributors gave liberally for specific objects. Many put all they had into the common cause. Some would sell property and lay the price at the apostles' feet.

In those primitive days of the Christian Church, living was cheap. The apostles, no doubt, were at first supported by the generosity of the people, who entertained them in their itinerancy; but as the Church grew and Christianity spread and took organized form in many localities, which it did in the days of Paul, the necessity for systematic support became evident. From the time of the sending out of the Seventy on the Great Commission, until our own day, the Church's history has been one of steady expansion. To-day, in addition to the army of pastors in Christian lands, there are among the heathen nearly 20,000 white missionaries and 95,000 native converts working unceasingly to carry out the command of Christ "to preach the Gospel to every creature." That any one should contend that such a work should be done without proper, systematic support is absurd. And the principal way in which such support must come is through collections from the Christian people of this and other countries.

In early days in our land, the preachers of the Gospel were comparatively few and mostly pioneer itinerants, living in much the same manner as the Seventy probably lived in the Orient. Since that time, the cost of living has quadrupled, and it is no longer possible to conduct a ministry on pioneer principles, any more than it was possible to support the extensive Jewish religious system in the way in which it was supported during the wilderness sojourn. The Christian Church has long passed out of its wilderness; it is now a mighty agency for world evangelization—an agency to which all good men and women are glad to have the privilege of contributing. Its duties and opportunities have multiplied, and to-day its ramifications extend in a thousand different directions, that could not have been foreseen a few centuries ago. It is the poorest tribute that could be paid to any intelligent man or woman to ask them to believe that God intended his Church to continue to remain small, insignificant and unsupported, or that the Great Commission, which was laid upon his followers by the Son of God, could ever be carried out by a policy of niggardliness and selfishness.

Sweden's Unsettled Strike

SWEDEN'S great labor strike is not yet settled. There is a general deadlock in all kinds of industry, but as far as reported there have been no serious disturbances and no drunkenness. The Swedish working-people are merry-hearted, and carry their ordinary troubles lightly. Fond of music and social gatherings, they are never so happy as when, with their relatives and neighbors, all "bravely drest in Sunday best," and with fiddles and streamers, they are sailing smoothly along some of the many Swedish waterways, violins and voices keeping perfect time to the measure of the oars. At weddings, fairs, festivals and picnics, this is the uniform picture of the social life of Sweden's peasantry. But there is a sterner and more strenuous side to the national character, and it will be well if the old Swedish spirit does not break forth at some point during the present strike.

Flood-Stricken Mexico

ONE of the worst disasters for many years has befallen northern Mexico, especially the city of Monterey and its vicinity. Unprecedented rains caused the river and streams to rise to a point far above high-water mark, and a district three miles long and four blocks wide was entirely swept away from the city's front. The people were unprepared, and were caught by the rising waters. At a moderate estimate, over one thousand perished. As many bodies were carried down stream, it is not likely that the real loss of life will ever be known. The financial loss to the city will amount to over $15,000,000, as every store and commercial house was flooded and stocks ruined. Monterey, at this writing, is completely isolated from the outside world; the railways have been washed away and the roads are impassable. Thousands were made homeless, and slept exposed to wind and rain for nearly two days before they could be reached and taken to a part of the city where they would be safe and could be fed and sheltered. There are not more than a dozen rowboats in the entire city, which made the work of rescue both long and difficult. People in parts of the city which were not under water opened their homes to the hapless refugees, and gave them what food they had. Most of the city's streets were like canals, and the people were driven to the upper stories.

The city authorities are doing the best they can, but with the city threatened with pestilence, typhoid breaking out in all quarters and a famine in prospect, the outlook is far from cheerful. The officials have taken charge of the bakeries and are overseeing the distribution of food, which is very scarce. There is already much suffering in the poorer quarters of the city, and it threatens to increase if the railroads are not speedily rebuilt so that food may be brought in. The reports from outlying districts have yet to be received. The American Consul-General, Mr. P. C. Hanna, is active in relief work, and is being assisted by members of the American Association.

The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, realizing the need of immediate assistance, has telegraphed the Consul-General, tendering the active co-operation of the readers of this paper in any relief measures that may be needed.

Religious Service in Camp

REGULATION religious services were held during the recent manœuvres near Boston. A notable service was one in the camp of the Second Massachusetts Infantry. This regiment is in itself a distinguished one, composed of companies recruited in the towns of the western and central parts of the State. It has an illustrious record of service dating back to the Civil War. It was one of the first to respond to the call to arms at the opening of the war with Spain. The regiment was at once sent to the front; disembarked in the vicinity of Santiago in Cuba, and took part in the battle before that city. A number of its men were lost in action, more died later from wounds received in battle and from disease. The men were commanded by veteran regular officers. The soldiers were noted for the steadfast way in which they stood the Spanish fire and for their eagerness to engage the enemy. In Springfield there stands a statue of a young soldier marching off to the war, with his rifle on his shoulder, which was dedicated to the men of the Second Massachusetts Regiment who laid down their lives for their country.

Our government has provided for the religious as well as the physical wants of the soldiers and sailors; recognizing that above guns, ammunition and commissary wagons and the equipments of the camp and field, there is a divine Power to be reckoned with and relied upon. The song of confidence in the wisdom and guidance of Jehovah on the part of Judah is expressed in the book of Isaiah, and it is by the adoption of the righteous principles of the eternal God and in reliance on his guidance that our nation has had its birth and growth and will continue to reflect its glory.

Trust ye in the Lord forever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength. (Isa. 26 : 4.)

Reception for Monkey

Mme. Zeggio, lady in waiting in the court of Queen Margherita of Italy, gave a reception at the Aspinwall in Lenox recently in honor of her marmoset monkey. Society was out in force to meet the diminutive creature, which rested lightly on the arms of its mistress. The monkey, which was bought in South Africa, sleeps in a gold cage which cost five thousand dollars. A reporter says that the marmoset acquitted himself creditably, looking grave when he should and chattering affably at the attempted pleasantries of the guests. The affair was such a social success that it is understood an effort will be made to prevail upon Mme. Zeggio to accept an invitation to a reception in Newport in honor of the monkey which has mingled with royalty.

It used to be said in olden times, when children or grown people did any unusually silly thing, that they were cutting "monkey shines." We can hardly conceive of anything more silly than the "monkey shines" which the exclusive society people of Lenox have just been cutting, in the brilliant reception given to the marmoset. Intellectual emptiness has had its illustration in the horse, dog, cat and monkey parties given by society in "high life" in America. Such entertainments, it seems, have reached their limit in the party of the royal monkey that sleeps in the golden bed. The Bible enjoins reverence for parents; great nations worship their ancestors; and a considerable number regard the monkey as the origin of the human race. The philosophy which accounts for the spontaneous evolution of dead matter into the monkey, and from the monkey into the man, would make the reception given to the marmoset quite becoming. But because the monkey and the other lower animals lack the living soul which man possesses, the attempt to make the monkey an intellectual or moral companion of man is supremely ridiculous.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. (Gen. 2:7.)

A Mother's Estimate of Children

It is fortunate for church and State that there are so many people in what is called "high life" who are not intellectual apes or moral paupers. There are so many of the people of the highest wealth and culture who have supreme contempt for the empty vanities of artificial social life, and who put a just estimate upon the simplest, truest and most substantial things in life, who believe in wifehood, motherhood and painstaking, sincere Christian endeavor. Mrs. Edith McCormick, of Chicago (wife of a millionaire in Chicago and daughter of John D. Rockefeller, the richest man in the world), has recently written an article in which she describes the value of her children to her. Among other things she says:

The woman of beauty, of talent, of charm, of executive ability, of strong conviction, of artistic temperament, of high ideals, of broad intelligence, of commanding presence, of warm sympathy, of keen perceptions, of deep feeling, of noble ambition, of loving humanity, finds her greatest glory in her children. Perhaps we have not cared for children as young girls. Books, music, art have filled our minds and satisfied our ambitions. But when we awaken to the realization that the baby in our arms is our own, that we have the right, the privilege, the honor to be called mother, we find that something new is within us, a love so different from any that we have experienced before—a pride, a jealous care, a great, overwhelming joy. A little soul loaned to us to love and to care for! What great confidence God has put in our love and our wisdom to make such a gift! Life now has a new aspect. No, it is not more beautiful than it was before, but it is more rounded—our horizon is broader—so much is open to us. The child, who to-day lies in our arms entirely helpless and dependent, is going to grow and develop. Is the unfolding of this spirit going to be met by an intelligent, loving mind, ready to grasp, to guide, to advise? And if this is so, how wonderful each moment of every day! Is this not the fulness of living? May I ask what sacrifice is? Is doing what love prompts us to do ever a hardship or a deprivation? Are not the noblest deeds of one's life the deeds prompted by love? In our married life it is love that paves each day's path with roses, and it is love which makes the thorns in the way not less pointed, but to hurt less. Even life itself is, and can be to a large extent, what we make it ourselves.

This mother's estimate of children is so full of good sense and good principles that it ought to be universally read. The psalmist counted that a large family was about the greatest earthly blessing God could bestow.

Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house: thy children like olive plants round about thy table. (Ps. 128:3.)

Italian Baby Plays with Diamonds

The one-year-old baby of Stephano Bardogo, of Jersey City, wore a diamond tiara and was amused with a hundred thousand dollars' worth of jewels, but the little thing grew tired playing with the small pieces of glass and working its teeth through by biting on them, and went back to its Noah's Ark, most of the paint of which it had sucked off, and to the Teddy Bear, which it had seriously wounded. Paolo Cantanella, who boards with Bardogo and is, like him, a day laborer, on leaving a Hudson River ferryboat saw a package lying on a bench. He opened it on his way home and saw a lot of jewelry set with sparkling stones. He thought, of course, that they were fake jewels—nothing more than pretty pieces of glass, such as actresses wear in theatres—and gave them to the baby as playthings. When the child got tired of them, the Bardogos traded them off to the neighbors for cups of sugar, dishes of butter and slices of bacon, and other things that they counted of real value. One of Cantanella's regrets was that he did not have a heavy brass chain to go with the watch, which had pretty pieces of glass in it. A reward of $5,000 was offered for the return of the jewels to the owner, and the appearance of these two hundred diamonds in this district of poverty led to their recovery by the owner. Captain Larkin, in describing his visit to the home of Bardogo, said: "I never saw so many diamonds before. They were so bright they hurt my eyes. If I had been asked to guess the value, I should have said a million dollars. We gathered them up literally by handfuls."

We have here an illustration of thousands of people who have the most precious things in life, but do not realize their value, and barter them away for trifling things of earth. The jewels of divine Providence and grace are scattered thick about us, and yet how many fail to appreciate them, counting them of no more value than little colored pieces of glass! The moral obtuseness and spiritual folly of men and women is illustrated in their unwillingness to appreciate and secure the pearl of great price.

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. (Matt. 13:45, 46.)

Over the World's Roof

Dr. Hunter Workman and his wife, Mrs. Bullock Workman, holding the world's record for the highest ascent (23,394 feet) made in the Himalayas, have just made their fifth journey in that region. The object of this last expedition was not to beat the record for height, but to explore the great glaciers of Hispar and Biafo, situated in the Karakoram range, across the Indus in the north of Kashmir, near the frontier of Tibet. This country of magnificent mountains is largely a virgin field for the traveler, and even to reach it necessitates an arduous journey of six weeks from the coast, through broiling valleys and across peaks as high as Mont Blanc. Some of the rivers to be crossed were spanned only by perilous bridges of rope stretched across boiling torrents, where one false step meant certain death. In the actual field of operations the difficulties were increased, for these mountains do not rise like the Alps out of inhabited valleys, but can only be reached by first traversing the vast stretches of ice. Every obstacle was, however, overcome and the intrepid pair ascended the great Hispar glacier and descended the Biafo glacier, separated from it by a lofty ridge. From this ridge a precipitous peak rises to the height of 21,350 feet. Mrs. Bullock Workman performed the wonderful feat, never accomplished by any one before, of climbing it, and christened it "Watershed Peak."

What physical stamina, courage, level-headedness, energy and dogged persistency were required to perform this feat! By it they have laid the scientific world under large obligation to them. Votaries of science are climbing over the roof and steeples of the world, and digging in its basement, to discover some new truth that will enrich human thought and contribute to man's benefit. There are mental and moral altitudes to climb, involving the gravest perils and greatest obstacles, but faith, energy, love and hope will enable men successfully to climb these heights on their way to the life which is beyond.

And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them into the top of the mountain. (Num. 14:40.)

Diamond in Fingernail

Alphonse Albert Dupuy, an Evanston tailor, recently had a diamond set in his little fingernail. The stone is one-third carat. On ordinary occasions the tailor wears a thimble over the bejeweled finger, to prevent the nail being broken and the diamond lost. In these times of novelty in advertisement, Mr. Dupuy may have wanted to start the community talking about him and his tailor shop. The freak of decoration was more than likely the expression of vanity, which is often seen among empty-minded and shallow-hearted men and women. There are feminine and masculine decorations that in folly and ridiculousness come in close competition with the diamond in the fingernail.

And they followed vanity and became vain. (II. Kings 17 : 15.)

THE WORK OF TAYLOR UNIVERSITY

TAYLOR UNIVERSITY is in many respects a cosmopolitan school. Students come to it not only from the States west of the Rockies and from the Atlantic Coast, but from Europe, Asia, Africa, and the isles of the sea; and it is her unique and important position among the colleges of the land that has drawn young people from this wide extent of territory. It was named after Bishop William Taylor, the all-around-the-world evangelist; and the university has taken on many of the characteristics of her patron saint. Above all other things, he was evangelistic; given up to the spread of the Gospel. That peculiarity has always marked the student body of this institution. Its young men have gone out from it imbued with the evangelistic spirit, with a zeal for Christ and for the spread of his kingdom on earth.

President Vayhinger

Bishop Taylor was thoroughly consecrated to the work of his Master; and such a consecration characterizes many of the young men and women of this institution. The spirit of Taylor seems to have rested upon the school. Taylor was a missionary of the highest character, and many students from Taylor University have already gone to the foreign field and many more are in preparation for that noble work. Students from foreign lands are here preparing to go back to their native lands as preachers of the Gospel of Jesus. Two from the Kurd race will go back to that cruel people and proclaim the power of the Saviour to transform them by his meek and lowly spirit. Representatives from Africa will carry the message to their home land; another from Jamaica will soon be proclaiming the Gospel on that island; there are also students from Cuba, Porto Rico and the Barbadoes, who are preparing for missionary work. Many students are preparing for the ministry in our own country.

Taylor University is a school that gives specially an opportunity to young men and women of limited means. Many young men and women are paying part of their expenses by working for the university. A large number of those who have gone out into the world, blessing it with their Christian education, could never have had it but for the opportunity afforded them in this institution. Young people with a determination to have a Christian education, with as much emphasis on the "Christian" as on the "education," will always be able to find a way to secure it here. The appeals that come from young people with no means are such as to stir the heart of almost every benevolent man in the country, could he know of it. Some of the best minds and the most consecrated hearts are longing to secure an education in an institution where the trend of things is Godward. Many of these must be turned away for lack of means. Here is a rare opportunity for men and women who wish to benefit humanity by investing money in the foundation of a character that shall go out to bless the world. Here a small amount of money will transform some boy or girl into a man or woman with trained heart and mind.

The school is at present handicapped with a debt that has accumulated in the years that are past. It is imperative that this debt be removed at once, and we believe that the Lord will put it into the hearts of men and women to give to this end. Mrs. Gehman, recently deceased, left a bequest of $7,000 for Taylor University, to be used in the erection of a music hall, and the estate of Mrs. Osborn, which is now being closed up, will yield several thousand dollars, which can also be used toward the erection of this building, so that a beautiful new structure in the near future is practically assured.

An effort is being made, under the direction of the Rev. U. L. Snead, to secure a farm near by which shall give employment to worthy needy students, furnish provisions for the dining hall, and become the agriculture department of the university. Dr. Archibald, formerly acting president, has an endowment enterprise in an orange grove on the Isle of Pines. In the course of five years this orange grove will be a productive endowment for Taylor University.

The great need of Taylor is money to meet her financial obligations, and put her on her feet that she may carry on her great work of Christian education.

The past school year was a prosperous one. It was characterized early in the year by an excellent revival, and many of the new students knelt at the altar and received a definite work of grace. At the first regular service five young men knelt at the altar to ask for purity or for pardon. It was an inspiring occasion. Nearly every service is a revival service.

The last commencement was one of the most interesting that has been held since the foundation of the university. Friends and relatives of the graduates came from far and near to see the members of the graduating class receive their diplomas. The exercises extended through several days. There were religious services, which showed well the Christian spirit which pervades the university. Every visitor left with a strong impression that the university was doing a practical work for Christian education in America, and deserved the loyal support of the public.

LITTLE TALES OF THE CUMBERLANDS

By PRESIDENT W. L. STOOKSBURY
Lincoln Memorial University

JUST after vacation, there were quite a number of students enrolling at Lincoln Memorial University. Two sisters, of the ages of about sixteen and eighteen respectively, entered the office, and the elder said: "We come to git into school."

"Did you write me about coming?"

"No."

"Well, I doubt if we have room for you." "Well, we want to be teachers of the public school in our neighborhood. We come frum a fam'ly of twelve childern, an' pap hain't got no money to send us to school. We worked this summer an' have got jist five dollars apiece, an' this is all the money we have got."

"I wish we could take you, but I do not know that we can make room for you." "We'll stay in a fam'ly and work evenin' and mornin' fur our board and keep," was the reply. "We air willin' to do any kind uv work, jist so we may have a chance to git into school."

I remembered that a lady living near by had asked me to send her a girl to help about the housework, so I directed these girls to her. They started off through the rain for her home. When they reached the home they found that the lady had just employed a girl. She directed them to a neighbor near by; but this lady did not need help, and so they were directed from one neighbor to another until late in the afternoon, when they returned to the office, much disappointed, sad and weary because of having tramped through the rain. I called the matron of the girls' dormitory, and told her that these girls must have a place; that she must go over and have some of the girls give up a room and go in with other girls, so as to make a place for these sisters. The matron told the girls of the hall the story of the two sisters, and two of the girls volunteered to give up a room and go in with their friends, and the two new girls were put in the room vacated. They were industrious as well as ambitious. I wrote some friends in the East, who sent fifty dollars apiece, and with the work they did and the fifty dollars each these girls got through the school year. Soon they will be ready to go back into the mountains as teachers.

Distant View of Lincoln Memorial University

Three years ago we sent out from Lincoln Memorial University fifty young men and women to teach in the public schools of the mountains. Two years ago we sent out sixty-five. Last year we sent out seventy-five. These teachers have an average attendance of about sixty pupils. Because of these teachers the influence of Lincoln Memorial University reaches annually nearly five thousand pupils. These teachers are not only active in the day school, but they are frequently the superintendents in the Sunday School and take special part in the church services. The Normal Department is made very prominent in Lincoln Memorial University. Our teachers are always in demand, and frequently the demand is greater than the supply.

One day last year I was hearing a class in Lincoln College when one of the students came to me and said: "There is some one at the door who wishes to see you."

I went to the door and found a woman poorly clad, with an old sunbonnet and a little faded shawl about her shoulders. As she looked up at me I shall never forget the pathetic expression in her face and eyes. She said: "I want to see the manager of the school."

"I am the man I suppose you are looking for," I replied.

"My husband died five years ago an' left me with five ehildern, from five to twelve year old. The little farm my father left went into the hands of the lawyers an' when the suit was over we hadn't a dollar left; so I am without a home an' without friends, it seems, an' I am so anxious to git my childern in a good school, with good surroundin's, an' for that reason I come to see you. I was told by a friend that you were a tender-hearted man, and if you possibly could you would help me."

"What can I do for you?"

"Will you furnish me a house, or jist one room, if no more, in which I ean live an' keep my ehildern with me; and I'll work, yes, I'll work day and night, if you want me, to keep the ehildern in school. I don't want to beg; I'm too proud to beg, but I am willin' to work."

That is the true spirit of the mountains!

Graee Nettleton Home adjoins the property of Lincoln Memorial University. This Home is now able to aceommodate about thirty young girls, ranging in age from six to fourteen. Lincoln Memorial University furnishes the teachers for these little girls, and in that way we are able to help quite a number of the orphan children. The authorities of this Home are compelled to turn a number away each year; so is Lineoln Memorial University. Last year we enrolled in all departments six hundred and forty students, and were eompelled to turn one hundred applicants away for the lack of proper accommodations. The idea of the $500,000 endowment for Lincoln Memorial University is to supply these needs and equip the institution to meet fully the demands upon it.

A Shut-In Who Wrote 2,000 Hymns.

IDA L. REED, the well-known hymn writer, was born in 1865, near the town of Philippi, W. Va. Her life has been spent on the farm where she was born. Her father died several years ago, and her mother being an invalid Ida had to look after the farm as well as to care for her afflicted mother. She had few educational advantages, but she developed a natural gift as a poet and hymn writer and has composed some of the most helpful hymns that are to be found in the collections of the present day. Miss Reed has been a writer of hymns for twenty years. During that time she has written more than two thousand selections, which have been widely published in the books used by different denominations. Her hymns that have become most popular are "I Belong to the King," "I Cannot Drift Beyond Thy Love," "Somebody Is Praying for You," "The Father's Love" and "Blessed Hiding." The hymn "I Belong to the King" was composed after reading a story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many years since, entitled "A Princess in Calico."

Ida L. Reed

After the death of her mother, she moved to the town of Philippi, where she now resides, having been obliged to sell the old homestead to pay the debts of the estate. During these years she has lived by herself, practically shut in from the world, owing to frail health. She is wholly dependent for a livelihood on the contributions of her friends and what little she receives from the sale of bookmarkers. Miss Reed is a rare Christian character, patient, and with a bright experience which is a benediction to many. Any reader wishing to know more about this gifted shut-in can do so by writing to her pastor, Rev. A. D. Craig, of Philippi, W. Va.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—MRS. MARY STARK, missionary, Casilla 58, Callao, Peru, writes: "Your readers have shown so much kind interest in the Lord's work in this land that I think perhaps some one will be kind enough to send us a New Testament Picture Scroll, such as are used in Sunday Schools. Our men use them and find them helpful in the work of selling Bibles."

—MRS. J. O. DYMES is a Lutheran missionary in South Madagascar, being stationed at Manasoa, Tuliar, in a very hot and unhealthy part of the island. The mission was opened in 1887, and already seven missionaries from the United States have given up their lives through climatic sickness, and are buried at Manasoa, while others have been invalided home. But the work goes on bravely.

—REV. NICOLAS ZAMORA writes from Manila: "On April 25, 1909, the Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands was incorporated. Rev. Alexander Reyes and Rev. Diosdado Alvarez united with us. Rev. Vietoriano Marino and Rev. Hipolito Guirnalda have been ordained as deacons, one in Manila and the other in Pangasinan. We have 112 local preachers, with 4,500 members, and six new chapels and a stone house for a seminary in Tondo."

—THE CHICAGO, BURLINGTON AND QUINCY Railroad has followed the example of the Pennsylvania system, in promoting the circulation of the Bible, by placing the Book of books in the library compartments of all its trains. In this respect the American railroads have followed the initiative set by the Scottish railroads. This has been brought about largely by the "Gideons," an organization of traveling salesmen, who have most persistently urged the general and free circulation of Bibles in the hotels throughout the United States.

—REV. N. L. ROCKEY, M. E. Mission, Gonda, U. P., India, writes: "The latest Indian famine is practically over, but has left the attendant evils. It was followed by one of the worst seasons of malaria ever known, and tens of thousands died. Cholera, too, had its share in decimating the weakened ones. The dearness of provisions is to be accounted for only by the pernicious cornering of wheat. The railroads have carried so much of it to the coast that we can get it only at exorbitant rates, viz., about 1¾ cents a pound. Had not the corner taken place, this wheat would not have moved to any great degree and we would have gotten it at 1¼ cents a pound. The ½ cent difference marks the difference between a sufficiency and constant hunger with people who earn on the average only 5 to 10 cents a day. Every grain is exorbitantly dear."

A Personal Message

OF INTEREST TO YOU

DEAR FRIEND:—Our Fall and Winter Campaign is just opening. Owing to the improved condition of commercial and financial affairs, and the unprecedentedly large crops, this Christian Herald Campaign must be an unusually extensive and aggressive one, if we are to reap our share of the universal improvement.

One of the phases of our coming propaganda will be the sending out of an enormous edition of our Annual Circular, beautifully illustrated and printed in six colors and gold. The edition will probably reach 2,000,000, and to judiciously distribute so large a number we need more names and addresses of possible subscribers than we now have in stock.

To secure these names we appeal to our subscribers. Next to the publisher of this paper, they have the largest direct vital interest in the widening out of its sphere of influence and in the increase of its already enormous subscription list. They know what the paper stands for; they know the good it has accomplished; they know the benefit they and their families have derived from it in the past, and they believe, with us, that it will be even better in the future.

Now, to make a better paper we require a larger circulation. To get a larger circulation we must make the advantages of The Christian Herald known to as many people as possible, and to do this we ask you to co-operate with us, and we, on the other hand, will surely make it worth your while.

Many, indeed, most of our subscribers would, we know, gladly co-operate with us to this end without hope of fee or reward. They would consider it a labor of love in which they would cheerfully engage and would send us the twenty-five names with their compliments and good wishes. But we feel that it is but right and proper that we should offer them proper compensation for their trouble and expense, and we are therefore making provision in that direction

But we will not talk of compensation in this issue, as we hardly have space enough for that purpose. We will, however, say to you to-day: It is imperative that you

GET READY AT ONCE

Do not put this off until to-morrow; to-day is the day; to-morrow you may forget it. Remember, we will make it worth your while, and also remember that this offer is open only to our subscribers and their immediate families.

PLEASE read what follows below very carefully and then act at once.

Our Preliminary Announcement

IN AN early issue we shall publish the details of a most interesting proposition, which involves on the one hand your sending to us twenty-five names of the character fully described below, and on the other hand our sending to you a very remunerative and exceptionally attractive Reward. This offer will be open only to our Subscribers and their immediate Families, and every list sent in must close with this declaration:

"I am a subscriber."

OR:—

"My ..... is a subscriber."

Here state relationship

and be signed by the name and address of the sender.

The names which may be sent in under this offer must be those of Adult Protestant Church or Sunday School Attendants, no two living in the same house.

These names must be written on only one side of the sheet. You may use more than one sheet in a single list, but you must not write on both sides of any sheet.

Every name must have a Prefix (such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Dr., Prof., Rev.), Christian Name (as Mary, John, etc.), Post Office Address, County, and State. In case of Free Delivery Office in city or country, either the Street Address or the number of the Rural Free Delivery route should be supplied.

Thus an address correctly supplied would read something like this:

Dr. James Potter, Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., 572 Adams Street

OR:—

Miss Ruth Jackson, Westminster, Worcester Co., Mass., R.F.D. No. 6

We publish this preliminary notice to enable everybody to be prepared for immediate action as soon as our special and exceedingly attractive announcement reaches their hands. The offer will close within a very few days after the announcement and in sparsely settled districts the time allotted might prove insufficient were it not for this timely warning, which is equal to one week's additional notice. LOOK FOR IT IN THIS COLUMN.

We cannot too strongly urge upon our readers the advisability of securing BEFORE the Special Announcement appears the material for a prompt response, so that not a minute need be lost in sending in your list. DO IT TO-DAY AND DO IT AT ONCE. In this case there is no time like the present. We want these names for mailing our superbly Illustrated Holiday Circular, which will be off the press shortly. Your friends will thank you for getting their names on our mailing list and we will appreciate your kind co-operation. Address

IMPORTANT.—When you send in a List never send any other communication in the same envelope, as the Lists are handled in a separate department. PLEASE REMEMBER THIS.

A Christian Japanese Judge in Korea

THE appointment of Judge Noboru Watanabe to be the head of the Judicial Department in Korea is a matter of no small importance in the history of Christian progress in the East. For a number of years, Judge Watanabe was at the head of the Highest Court in Yokohama. During that time, he and his wife were leaders in Christian and all other good work. As President of the Yokohama Y. M. C. A. he did much to popularize and strengthen that institution.

Judge Watanabe

In an account of his conversion he says: "As I look back upon my past life, I feel that I have been continually led of God, and I can not but wonder at his goodness and the marvelous way in which he has directed my steps." Early in life he was carefully instructed in the principles of the Chinese philosophy and became well versed in the teachings of the sages. At the age of eighteen he went to Tokyo, and there chanced to get hold of a copy of Dr. Martin's Evidences of Christianity, and for the first time found out that God was not a mere abstraction, but a real and personal being. But beyond this he made no further investigation. About ten years later he happened to hear a Christian address on "Love," which affected him deeply. What especially interested him was the greatness of the love of Christ and how far it was beyond anything that he had ever before heard or conceived. And yet for a long time he was unwilling to yield his heart to God and used to argue with his friends and acquaintances that if Christ was a Saviour so were Buddha and Confucius.

It was not until the year 1897 that he was led to an acceptance of Christ as a personal Saviour. In attendance upon the weekly lectures of Rev. Mr. Uyemura, he came to understand more fully how great was the love of God in Christ, and a new light broke in upon his soul. He made a public profession of his faith, and from that time he has gone steadily forward in the Christian life, not as a hearer only, but as a doer of the Word.

When congratulated by Bishop Harris on his recent appointment, he replied that he was going to Korea not simply to interpret the law, but that he might be a witness for Christ.

Answered Prayers

R. J. H., Ohio. "He heard and answered my prayers."

Reader, East Earl, Pa. "I thank God for the answer of a prayer when full of trouble."

R. M. R., Tennessee. "I am so grateful that the Lord answered my prayer."

E. T., Texas. "God has restored our child to health, and added other blessings."

Mrs. L. W., Illinois. "I promised God to acknowledge it if he would answer my prayer. I take this method of so doing."

M. B., Richmond, Va. "I desire to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayers many times."

What a Stranger Saw at Mont-Lawn

By C. O. S. MAWSON, M.A., M.R.A.S.

"I LOVE God and little children." There are many in this fair land who would unhesitatingly make such an avowal; but how many are there whose love so expresses itself in worthy deeds? When I first saw these golden words, which adorn the entrance to the Children's Home at Nyack, N. Y., the voices of three hundred happy children were ringing in my ears; the hillside resounded with a welcome such as falls to the lot of few men; and the genial founder, Dr. Klopsch, flung back the greeting in kind—a veritable boy received in triumph by his playfellows. His is the part of a foster-parent, yet a comrade withal. One look at his face as he hailed his beloved children revealed the love he bears them—a love which is felt by every child, and to which every child responds. Unconsciously my eyes sought once more the sunlit legend above the portal, and its full significance was borne in upon me. That all who run might read and understand, the words could truthfully be: "I live for God and little children."

Nowhere in the whole world have I seen such an undertaking as this; the very perfection of the scheme bespeaks an able organizer as well as a lover of children. Mont-Lawn is not an ordinary institution; rather is it a village of clean and artistic homes, where the members all gather together at one family board, sing and worship in one Temple, and conform to the rules and guidance of one head. "Health, happiness, harmony" are the watchwords. The children know they are there to be happy and to radiate happiness around them. They are there for a holiday; a holiday all too brief, but free from every want or sadness. For at least ten days in their young lives their heaven is unclouded, and all seems radiant without and within. Looking at the bright upturned faces, it was hard to believe that these children were of the poorest and most friendless in the metropolis. How quickly fresh air, good food and happy surroundings transform even the most delicate child!

What particularly impressed me was the fact that in this vast charitable enterprise the seal of "charity" in its worldly sense is nowhere visible. The most sensitive child could feel no sense of shame or patronage. For instance, should a child arrive in ragged or wretched clothing, an outfit is provided by the Home, but all semblance of uniformity is conspicuous by its absence. These friendless children (can they indeed be friendless with such a friend?) are virtually at Mont-Lawn as the young guests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Teachers are there to amuse them, and look after their needs and comfort; while an enthusiastic sergeant is provided for the older boys, to lead and organize their games and to take them for romps and excursions in the beautiful country around Nyack.

The obvious intelligence of the children was most notable. Doubtless their native environment tends to foster this precocity. Mrs. Hopkins, the able and courteous lady superintendent of the Home, assured me that not only are the children most intelligent, but as mouldable as wax. The way they fall into marching line, and take their signals from the gong, is excellent; for Dr. Klopsch rightly instils a spirit of obedience and discipline. Confusion and disorder cannot reign at Mont-Lawn.

Still more remarkable is their singing; and it seemed inconceivable that one-third of these clear-voiced singers had only been there one day, and another third but three days; for the children go and come in batches of from eighty to one hundred three times a week, each child remaining at Mont-Lawn for a clear ten days. When the children took their places in the beautiful Temple the crowning gift of the founder), their singing was heard to great advantage. The swing and the "go" were magnificent. In perfect tune, and with an enthusiasm that no American child ever lacks when singing of his beloved country, they commenced the exercises with that patriotic song:

The Road to "The Children's Paradise"

It matters not where we may roam,
Or what may be our quest,
Our own, our dear old native land
We're sure to love the best.

Then at the close of each verse every child produced a miniature flag, and waved it aloft to the time of the rousing chorus. Standing as we were on the platform facing the young singers, the spectacle was at once effective and inspiriting. When the last notes of the organ died away every right hand was raised, every eye upturned to the outspread Stars and Stripes, and every voice clearly and proudly proclaimed:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the Republic for which it stands: one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The sacred hymns were rendered with no less fervor and heartiness, and though I have heard children sing in many lands none have afforded me greater pleasure nor shown better appreciation of both words and music than these bright youngsters at Mont-Lawn. That the teachers themselves are all musical goes without saying. The occasion of which it most reminded me was the memorable morning service in the chapel of the Foundling Hospital, London; and surely no sweeter voices can be heard in all that great metropolis.

Though no set tasks are given (for this is essentially a holiday home), yet, through the medium of music, these children are imbibing truths which will sink deep into their lives. No religious formulæ are observed, no specific creed is enforced; children of Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, Moslem or infidel—it matters not. No questions are asked, no vows exacted, for the love for the children rises above the narrowness of any creed. The Temple is dedicated to the one Father of all; and in that beautiful edifice, with its soft light bathing the worshipers, and the story of the Friend of little children pictured on the stained-glass windows, even the most love-starved child will surely feel less lonely and will take away impressions and memories that nothing can quite efface. Though a layman, I was struck with the value and the possibilities of these simple services and felt that when the roses may have faded from the cheeks and the words of the songs be forgotten there will still be a something woven into the fibre of every child that will some day be recalled with gladness; a something that will give new strength when every effort seems fraught with pain or disappointment; a something that will shed the light of hope amid the darkness of despair. To be the means of such a blessing is indeed a privilege. And yet can it be true that Dr. Klopsch has few or no imitators in this glorious work? Over thirty thousand children have already benefited by this Home, and in the hands of such as these lies the future of the United States. Patriotism re-echoes the call of humanity and religion—"Come, let us live for the children." Such work as Dr. Klopsch performs is no longer experimental. It is eminently practical and far-reaching, worthy of the widest recognition and emulation. As I drove through the old-fashioned gateway, feeling better for having come in contact with such a Home and such a benefactor, one who courts neither fame nor praise, the inscription gleaming from the inner beam gave point to my thoughts, conveying as it does both a truth and a prophecy: "Fragile Beginnings of a Mighty End."

The Flag Drill on the Lawn

first twenty miles of the trip are made by wagon. Then comes a steep and difficult trail leading to the summit of the mesa. A wagon road is being constructed up the side of the mesa to the brink of the canyon that overlooks the Spruce Tree House. The area of the park proper is 65.5 square miles, or 41,920 acres; but the act of Congress also provided for the custodianship and preservation of all prehistoric ruins and monuments in a strip five miles wide surrounding the park. The area of this reserved strip is 274 square miles, or 175,360 acres, so that 340 square miles of mesa and canyons are included in this new national playground. Its attractions are of a vastly different character from those of the Yosemite or the Yellowstone. When they become better known, they will attract their full quota of tourists and sightseers.

The Mesa Verde takes its name (signifying "green tableland") from the heavy growth of piñon and cedar that covers it with verdure. Its altitude ranges from 6,000 to 8,500 feet above sea level, and from 1,000 to 2,000 feet above the Montezuma Valley that bounds it on the north.

What became of the cliff dwellers? Since it seems unthinkable that they were conquered, exterminated or driven out by a stronger or more warlike race, why did they forsake their homes, constructed with so much care and such infinite labor, in these lofty canyon walls? The question is not difficult to answer. Like the Hopis, and other existing tribes of the Southwest that have attained the Pueblo state of culture, the peoples of the cliffs were agriculturists, tilling their fields of maize, beans, squashes and other crops. The population of the Mesa Verde must have been large—certainly many times greater than the region could now support without irrigation, which they never practised. It is plain, then, that when the cliff homes were inhabited the rainfall must have been much larger than it now is to make crop production possible, and the permanent springs must have been larger and more numerous. No doubt the abandonment was gradual, and was caused by the slow but inexorable decline in the rainfall and consequent drying up of the springs. Successive crop failures doubtless drove the people to leave their old homes and seek new abiding places in regions where the clouds were more prodigal of their rain and where the food and water supply was less precarious. But nowhere else did they build so imposingly or so enduringly as on the Mesa Verde.

Baron Nordenskiold, the Swedish scientist, explored the ruins in 1891. He cut down a tree which grew within the ruins of one of the mesa dwellings and whose rings indicated that it was about 200 years old. It is believed that the cliff homes were already tenantless when the Spaniards entered the Southwest, nearly 370 years ago; and Dr. Fewkes is of the opinion that they have been unoccupied for at least 500 years—perhaps for twice that length of time.

Vanity Fair*

THOSE who consider that the present generation is exposed to more trials than its predecessors may well read the great chapter in Pilgrim's Progress upon the temptations which befell Faithful and Christian in Vanity Fair. They are the old and well-known ones. We of to-day have nothing new in the line of sins, charming or revolting. And their punishments remain also the same. Both the charm and the penalty are sketched by the master hand of Thackeray in his story named after this town of temptations—a story which might, perhaps, better be called an expanded tract.

It is not unlikely that Bunyan, in picturing the progress of Faithful and Christian through a sinful place, meant to stamp with disapproval the practice of certain sects in withdrawing from the world in order to preserve their purity. The ideal Christian is not he who abandons the fight and devotes himself to his own personal improvement; but he who goes forth into the thick of the conflict, where Apollyon may seem to be winning. It must be that offenses come to the faithful disciple, but he does not run away from them. He buckles on the armor, expressly described in the last chapter of Ephesians, and cultivates that true Christian heroism which can never develop in the cloister.

"The Jewish type of a saint," says Bishop Williams, "was the ascetic, the hermit, the anchorite; who came into the world of men only now and then, like a foreigner, a visitant from some distant and unearthly sphere. Compare with that Christ and his Christianity. He began his ministry at a wedding feast, and was to be found at the dinner party, the reception; now at the wealthy publican's, now under the humble roof of the Galilean fisherman; the friend of the worldling, the outcast, the reprobate; yet, through all that mingling, contracting no stain upon his holiness, but breathing upon sin everywhere the breath of a gentle yet fiery cleansing. Christianity is essentially a missionary religion. Lose the missionary idea and you may have something quite respectable left, a neat, Jewish, Pharisaic plan for the saving of your own mean little soul by isolating it from the great, needy, sinning world—but you have not Christ's Christianity. For this strange paradox is true—you can keep your Christianity only by giving it away."

And the place to give it away, the darkness in which the candle of each Christian is most needed, is in the Vanity Fair of the great world. It may be too strong for us. Many brave spirits are daily overcome by it. Or it may ruin our bodies while our souls "go marching on," as did Faithful's; of whom Christian sang, "Though they killed thee, thou art still alive." And as with Faithful and Christian, many may be led by your faithfulness to see that true joy lies only in the strait path.

President Eliot, learned, thoughtful, exemplary in his life, has vaguely formulated for us a "new religion," in which the "Celestial City" plays an insignificant part, possibly none at all. He has not taken into consideration the immemorial hunger of the human heart; the leading part which, in the New Testament, is played by the sweet hope of a blessed immortality; and especially he may have forgotten that it is the animating motive of the book we are considering, a book which may have moulded the minds of men more than any other since time began, except the Bible. President Eliot admits Vanity Fair; but he denies the sweet land of compensation, where the blows and the obloquy are all paid for—and more.

Opening the Mind*

DURING the progress of a long journey, those in a certain car had for several days an opportunity to watch a middle-aged woman, who, with her husband and two daughters, was among the passengers. All of the party were dressed neatly and even elegantly. Their conduct was quiet and kind. They seemed to be much above the common sort of people. What was the amazement of those near them to hear this refined-looking mother say to her daughters, "'Tain't no use meddlin' with them things."

As the days passed, it was clearly to be seen that this family, despite the appearance of culture which they presented, had never had their minds "opened." They had learned to dress their bodies, and they were evidently sound morally, which was the principal thing and very beautiful; but they had never learned to dress their thoughts in proper language.

You may often have been surprised at the quickness with which the unsophisticated absorb ideas regarding outward polish. They learn how to dress and how to carry themselves far oftener than how to express themselves, though they may be among those who use good English. It may be that the eye is more easily impressed than the ear; or the lust of the eyes and the pride of life may appeal to the human heart more than refinement of speech. Certainly, unless early training and a good education have opened the eyes of the understanding, not one youth will notice defects in his speech and thinking to one hundred who notice their defects in outward appearance.

"The fool saith in his heart, There is no God." One who talks much with men in different walks of life encounters occasionally those who deny God. Sometimes they pompously announce that there are "far more indications that there is no God than there are to the contrary."

To us who are Christians, the credulity required to believe that this material universe came into being without any author is far greater than that which is required to believe in an agent who made it all. Back of that, it is true, comes the immemorial mystery, Whence sprang the Infinite Being himself? But for most of us it is easier to believe in a living entity, always existent, than in an immortal material product. May God open the eyes of our understanding that we may grasp the meanings of these hidden truths!

Paul tells us in his Epistle to the Romans that faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. Translated into our modern speech, this would mean that diligent reading of the Bible is the main source of faith. Let us pray that, as Jesus opened the understanding of the disciples on that memorable day when he stood among them, risen from the dead, he may open ours, and that we may read his Word with intelligence. No one pretends that it is as important to be intellectually great as to be morally great; but it is certainly the next thing to it. Especially in this age of the world, when education is so widely diffused, is it important that the soldier of Christ should be thoroughly furnished with all good words, as well as all good works. God made our minds as well as our souls and our bodies. We dishonor him when we do not develop our every talent to the extent of our power and use all for his glory.

THE STORY OF MARCO

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

IN the newspapers the next morning there were glowing accounts of the great ovation given to the famous violinist. In at least one of the accounts this incident was mentioned:

"The applause in the first balcony was led by a curious little hunchback, who was dancing up and down in his seat and cheering like mad. Those who were nearest to him said that no sooner had the violinist stepped into view than this little hunchback gave one startled look, then sprang to his feet, yelling: 'Marco—Marco—it is Marco!' By that time the whole house was wildly cheering, the wildest of all still being the excited little hunchback in the balcony seat."

CHAPTER XXXIII

A Fourth of July

JIMMY'S friends will tell you that about this time Jimmy had a "streak o' luck." Certain it is that he began almost at once to have "money an' room ter branch out," as he had said that he wished he did have. Luxuries, too, crept into the home for the invalid mother; and a stout woman came to relieve Katy of care, and enable her to go to school more regularly.

Jimmy could have told you—but he would not, because he had promised not to tell—that Marco Covino was at the bottom of it all. Not that he, Jimmy, was accepting charity—certainly not. But Covino said he already owed the Nolans a great deal for past kindnesses, and nothing that he could ever do would repay them. As for the rest—he was merely making an investment on his own account, and helping Jimmy to take advantage of some exceptionally good business opportunities that had just come up.

Early in June Marco left the city, in acceptance of Mrs. Preston's invitation to come down to their country place on Long Island.

He had already seen a good deal of the Prestons, and he looked forward to this visit with no little eagerness. He told himself that it was because he would once more be out under a wide blue sky, with the green out-of-doors all about him; but he knew perfectly well that this was not the only reason for his anticipated enjoyment: the companions with whom he would share this wide blue sky and green out-of-doors had something to do with it.

He liked the Prestons. Howard Preston he considered his best friend. Mrs. Preston was to him a charming woman, and a delightful hostess. Miss Preston—but here he stopped abruptly; it had come to him that he was thinking a great deal about this young woman, with the haunting eyes and the soft halo of gold.

It was because of her name—he decided at once. It was natural, of course, that he should be drawn toward any Florence for the sake of his long-lost sister, Flossie. Then, too, their tastes were congenial. She played the piano with no little skill, and had tried many of his accompaniments. He enjoyed playing with her very much. She delighted, too, in outdoor life, and they had many plans for tennis, golf, boating and picnicking, to say nothing of riding and driving. Certainly, he had reason to joyfully anticipate his coming playday.

As for that curious feeling that each had seen the other, which was so pronounced at their first meeting, it was still present with them, and neither one had been able to tell whence it came, but they seldom mentioned it.

Upon his arrival at the Prestons', Marco found a large house-party for the week-end; but by Tuesday nearly all had gone back to the city, leaving only a very charming girl with a piquant face and a merry laugh—Madge Dana.

Marco liked Miss Dana at once. He said she "fitted in" just right; but it is doubtful if he realized that the reason she did "fit in" (so far as he was concerned) was because she made an ever-present fourth in their merry-makings, thus leaving Miss Preston more exclusively to himself—for of course Howard Preston would naturally bestow the greater share of his attention upon his guest, rather than upon his sister. Certainly, to Marco, it was a most delightful arrangement, and June passed all too soon.

On the first day of July Marco announced that he must go back to the city for a few days.

"Nonsense!" remonstrated Mrs. Preston. "As if there could be anything that needed your attention in that hot, stuffy city in July!"

"But there is."

Mrs. Preston frowned. Then her eyes grew anxious.

"Now, my dear boy, there's no one, surely, who admires all your numerous good deeds more than I do. But I think you owe something to yourself, as well as to all those hospitals and asylums, and countless ragamuffins that you are so fond of. Why, Florence," she added, turning to the girl at her side, "do you know I heard the other day that this Don Quixote of ours actually spent whole days tramping the worst streets of New York in search of a little hunchback boy whom he used to know years ago!"

Marco made a gesture of annoyance.

"I thought I had kept that, at least," he muttered.

"So it was true, then?"

This time, in spite of his vexation, he laughed outright.

"If that is the way I let things out, I ought not to wonder that I can't keep things, surely!" he exclaimed, in obvious disgust with himself.

At that moment Mrs. Preston was called from the room and only the girl was left to question him.

"I wish you'd tell me about it—the little hunchback," she entreated.

Marco made a gesture of dissent.

"It was nothing—really."

"But is it for him that you go now?"

"No; oh, no."

"It isn't your father, for you said yesterday he was doing well; besides, you ran in to see him only last week."

"No, it isn't father, though I shall go out to see him, of course. They don't like to have me come too often, you know—it excites him so much to see me. The nurse says letters are better. There's something curious about it. In spite of his love for me, it seems to work him all up to see me, sometimes."

"And still you must go to the city and leave us," she murmured.

"And still I must go to the city and leave—you."

At the emphasis upon the last word she colored a little.

"But you're coming back," she reminded him hurriedly.

"If I may; soon after the Fourth, perhaps."

"Why, of course you're coming back! You promised us all of June and July."

"You mean, Mrs. Preston promised me all of June and July," he corrected; and again the girl colored.

"We shall miss you—all of us," she murmured, with some precipitation. "Madge was saying only this morning what a pleasant party we made."

"You have been very good to me. You have made me like one of the family," returned the young man, gratefully.

"And you are one of the family," smiled Mrs. Preston, coming back into the room at that moment. She did not notice that for some time afterward Florence did not speak.

It was on the second of the month that the Prestons' distinguished guest went to New York; and for some days nothing was heard from him. Then, on the sixth, came a letter to Florence from a school friend—a letter which speedily sent Florence, with flushed cheeks and shining eyes, into Mrs. Preston's room.

"Mother," she cried tremulously, "just listen to this. It's from Elizabeth Bennett. You know she's gone as a sort of teacher or caretaker to that children's vacation home—Mont-Lawn. Listen! I'll skip to the part I want you to hear." And she read aloud:

"Do you know, Florence, what that adorable young violinist of yours has been up to now? No, of course you don't, for he's tried to be as secret as the grave about it. As if he could—Covino! Well, he's been up here playing. Only think of it—playing!—and to these three hundred kiddies who, the whole bunch of them, don't own enough money, probably, to buy a single ticket to one of his concerts!

"Now for the story:

"You may not know, but they make a great deal of the Fourth here, with invited guests from far and near and with usually three or four more or less noted speakers. Yesterday we were having our speeches as usual on the lawn when, during a pause, a slender, dark-eyed young fellow, who had been strolling about the grounds before the exercises, asked permission to speak to the children. It was granted, of course, and then he began.

"He said that ten or twelve years ago he, too, had been a boy here, and that he owed to this place the tenderest reverence, for here he first learned to be 'red, white and blue.' Naturally, such an odd way of putting it made everybody sit up; and we heard, then, the most wonderful word-painting that I have ever listened to as he went on to describe what he saw and heard here and how it had affected him. Long before he had finished, I saw all humanity in one glorious throng marching on to be red, white and blue, so contagious was his enthusiasm.

"Then, very quietly, after it was all over, he attempted to fade away. But he couldn't do it. Of course, the most of us hadn't the faintest idea who he was, but there were some on the speakers' platform who had a very decided idea, and they called him by name.

"It was all over then, naturally. He was plainly dismayed to be recognized, but when he found there was no help for it he made the best of it, and behaved like a dear. Some one was bold enough to say something about his playing for us, and he laughingly retorted that if he only had his violin he would. He supposed he was safe, poor man! But he little knew that crowd. In five minutes they had a score of scouts out in all directions, with instructions to bring back anything that looked like a fiddle. And they got one, too. It was a wretched instrument, belonging to an old colored man, who lives in a hut half a mile from here. I wish you could have seen Covino's face when they proudly displayed their trophy and announced that now he had his violin.

"At first I thought he was going to refuse. (You know artists are fussy

One Woman's Thank-Offering

MORE than twenty-five years ago, a stranger called to see me as a clergyman. She was on the eve of an operation that was likely to terminate fatally. The woman was entirely alone in the world, and mentally and spiritually in desperate straits. I promised to be with her at the time of the operation, and, in the event of her death, to attend to her burial; but we also agreed that, if she survived, for the rest of her life she must continue under my pastoral care. She did survive, and then resolved that, as a thank-offering to God for sparing her life, she must do something for him that would cost her, if necessary, the hardest kind of hard work.

The House Built by Faith

At that time my church (the Holy Communion—Protestant Episcopal—Twentieth Strect and Fifth Avenue) was in pressing need of a house properly equipped for our orphanage for babies. I asked the woman if she would undertake to raise the sum of $10,000 to build this house, and at once she assented. She labored fifteen years in collecting this sum, going from house to house and door to door, and gathering up this money chiefly in two-cent and five-cent contributions. The $10,000 with which she has built the house, which is perfectly adapted for the uses of our orphanage, represents no less than 40,000 contributors.

When this house had been finished, and after its formal dedication, she told me that, inasmuch as God had permitted her to raise the $10,000 wherewith to build the house, she must, if he would permit, raise a second $10,000 wherewith to endow it. She is now working on the second $10,000, but she is far advanced in years. Last winter she suffered from an illness that for two days threatened to become fatal. Her physical condition is very much impaired, and she is rightfully in fear that she may not live to complete the second tremendous self-imposed task. I am doing all in my power to help her to realize her hope, and I appeal to the public, which is always ready to respond in a good cause, for assistance. I know of no one to-day, in this metropolis, leading a more self-sacrificing life than this woman, my friend and parishioner, Mrs. Anna Rutherford. It is to be remembered that in helping her we are also helping, for all time to come, to give the best possible care in that house which she built to two dozen orphan babies.

HENRY MOTTET, D.D.,
Church of the Holy Communion, Protestant Episcopal, Twentieth Street and Fifth Avenue, New York.

Mrs. Anna Rutherford

The Babies' Home, which was built through Mrs. Rutherford's efforts, was dedicated October 19, 1904, at St. Johnland, Long Island, N. Y. It is a beautiful and perfectly equipped house, designed as a home for twenty-four orphan babies.

A touching incident is related in connection with Mrs. Rutherford's work: Not long ago she was soliciting in one of the poorer districts of Jersey City when she approached a laboring woman, to whom she told the story of her work. After listening courteously, the woman pointed to the condition of her dress and the poverty of her wretched home in proof of the fact that she could do nothing. The visitor left, but had not gone many steps when this same woman ran after and overtook her. She said she had not the heart to turn a deaf ear to such a pathetic appeal. If she died, she would thank God should his hand lead her baby to such a home. She added that she had no money; but in place of money she begged her to accept a paper of needles, which might at least, she said, be of use "in mending the orphan babies' clothes." This incident deserves a place not so far removed from that incident in the life of Jesus—the woman with the alabaster box of ointment. Jesus said, "She hath done what she could." Did not this poor woman, offering the paper of needles, do the same?

about their instruments, and I don't blame them.) But he gave one look around, and I suppose he saw in our faces what this thing was going to mean for us. So, with a funny little gesture, he threw up both his hands and shrugged his shoulders, as much as to say, 'Your crime be upon your own heads!' Then he picked up that wretched old violin, and actually made it talk. Of course the children were wild, and in no time they were dancing all over the lawn, while the rest of us—well, the rest of us really pinched ourselves to make sure we were awake.

"You are wondering already why you haven't seen it in the papers. There were only two reporters here, and by some necromancy Covino succeeded in swearing them to secrecy. But of course it will be out some time. Somebody who was here will tell—then good-by to the secret. But wasn't he a dear to do it?"

"And, mother, wasn't he?" cried Florence, fervently, as she dropped the letter into her lap.

"He certainly was, my dear," agreed Mrs. Preston, her gaze rather anxiously bent on the burning cheeks of the girl in the low chair by the window.

GROWING TOWARD GOD*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

SO mightily grew the Word of the Lord and prevailed." Let the banian tree be taken as an illustration of the way in which the Church of God grew. It is probably known to all that the peculiarity of the banian tree is that, from being a tree with a single trunk at first, it develops into a forest by the branches sending down roots which become accessory trunks. The grove thus formed sometimes covers several acres. Let the church at Jerusalem be compared with the parent trunk of the banian tree. The sap of the Lord which gave it life was the Holy Spirit, which filled those who waited in the upper room, as Jesus had told them to do. The church tree grew by leaps and bounds, three thousand souls being added in one day, and afterward it increased daily. Then a branch appeared, which cast down a rootlet in Samaria where, under the preaching of Philip, who was reinforced by the apostles Peter and John, many believers were gathered together. The life of the Spirit permeated the Samaritan Church. The next rootlet descended at Antioch in Syria, through the preaching of some who had fled from Jerusalem because of the persecution of Christians there subsequent to the martyrdom of Stephen. Barnabas, the good, was sent by the church in Jerusalem to look after the church in Antioch, and so mightily did it grow under his supervision that he sought and obtained as a helper the mighty Paul of Tarsus. The Antioch "trunk" rivaled in size and importance the parent trunk at Jerusalem. The next rootlet descended on the island of Cyprus, through the teaching of Paul and Barnabas. But it was only a feeble stem; we are not told that it ever took deep root. Presently a rootlet descended at Antioch in Pisidia; it dropped into unfriendly soil—at least unfriendly hands tried to uproot it—but it was carefully watched and tended by Paul and Barnabas. The church banian tree now covered an area of about five hundred miles from east to west, and six hundred miles from north to south. And more shoots rapidly descended at Lystra, Iconium and Derbe, and sizable church trunks were formed in each of these places, which were carefully nurtured by successive visits from Paul and Barnabas, and then by Paul and Silas.

Then a wonderful growth took place in the church-banian; a branch eight hundred miles and more long drops down a rootlet at Philippi, where a company of women are praying by the river-side on a Sabbath day. The church then extended from Asia into Europe. It was watered with the songs and prayers of Paul and Silas in the midst of persecution. But unfriendly hands could not uproot the tree of the Lord.

The next rootlet appeared at Thessalonica, which was probably less than fifty miles from Philippi. "A great multitude of Greeks, and chief women not a few," formed this new trunk at Thessalonica. Paul and Silas, as they had superintended its planting, would gladly have remained to nourish it, but the enemies of the Gospel were violent, and Paul and Silas departed for a season.

The church-banian kept on growing toward the west. A few miles removed from Thessalonica was Berea, where another rootlet descended, and in such good soil that the trunk there formed has been known through all the ages for its Bible study. It is said of the Christians there, "they searched the Scriptures daily."

Then the church-banian sent out a branch in another direction, toward the south. For a time a rootlet hung over the city of Athens. Paul was there to help its growth, but it took root in the hearts of only a few believers and finally disappeared. We do not read that any church was organized at Athens; only two persons are mentioned as believing, Dionysius and Damaris.

Again the church banian put out a new branch to the west, and at Corinth, less then fifty miles from Athens, a rootlet descended, which developed into a trunk of much size and strength, and yet its fiber was not of the best; it had spots of weakness in it, which the apostle Paul taught the Corinthian Christians to overcome.

For the time being the church banian had reached its growth toward the west, and turned upon itself, three hundred miles toward Antioch in Syria, and sent down a rootlet at Ephesus, the result being that a trunk was developed there through the extended ministries of Paul that was comparable with that at Antioch, and even Jerusalem itself.

Then the apostle Paul journeyed on to Jerusalem, finding at the seaside places where he stopped for a few days or hours slender stems of Christian life, which were still a part of the great church banian: at Miletus, at Tyre, and at Cæsarea. And at last he found himself close to the parent trunk in Jerusalem, and the brethren received him gladly. Teachers and scholars would do well to take a map of the journeyings of Paul, or better still, draw maps themselves, and outline a banian tree, with its several "trunks" as they have been described, and carefully review the work of the apostle Paul among the churches.

How the Word of the Lord Grew in Individual Lives

There was Lydia, "whose heart the Lord opened to give heed unto the things which were spoken by Paul" at Philippi. It will be remembered that Paul first preached the Gospel in Philippi to a company of women whom he found gathered for prayer beside the river on the Sabbath. They were Jewish women and proselytes. As a result of the preaching of Paul, Lydia became a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ and was baptized—the first Christian convert in Europe. How quickly the grace of Christian hospitality grew in her heart and led her not only to invite Paul and his associates, but to urge them in the name of the Lord to come and abide in her home during their stay in Philippi. And being so urged, they were constrained to do it. We recall the hospitality shown by the woman of Shunem to the prophet Elisha. She built an additional room for him in her home and furnished it, and told him that whenever he should come to Shunem he should turn in thither. Great was her reward for so doing (see II. Kings, chapter 4). And then there was the sweet hospitality shown to Jesus himself in the home at Bethany. An article has been written on "The Passing of the Spare Chamber," in which it is said: "We have no spare chamber. I have been troubled about it for a long time. Yesterday it occurred to me that the Browns have no

SENSE ABOUT FOOD

Facts About Food Worth Knowing.

It is a serious question sometimes to know just what to eat when a person's stomach is out of order and most foods cause trouble.

Grape-Nuts food can be taken at any time with the certainty that it will digest. Actual experience of people is valuable to anyone interested in foods.

A Terre Haute woman writes: "I had suffered with indigestion for about four years, ever since an attack of typhoid fever, and at times could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and then suffer such agony with my stomach I would wish I never had to eat anything.

"I was urged to try Grape-Nuts, and since using it I do not have to starve myself any more, but I can eat it at any time and feel nourished and satisfied, dyspepsia is a thing of the past, and I am now strong and well.

"My husband also had an experience with Grape-Nuts. He was very weak and sickly in the spring. Could not attend to his work. He was put under the doctor's care, but medicine did not seem to do him any good until he began to leave off ordinary food and use Grape-Nuts. It was positively surprising to see the change in him. He grew better right off, and naturally he has none but words of praise for Grape-Nuts.

"Our boy thinks he cannot eat a meal without Grape-Nuts, and he learns so fast at school that his teacher and other scholars comment on it. I am satisfied that it is because of the great nourishing elements in Grape-Nuts."

"There's a Reason."

It contains the phosphate of potash from wheat and barley which combines with albumen to make the gray matter to daily refill the brain and nerve centres.

It is a pity that people do not know what to feed their children. There are many mothers who give their youngsters almost any kind of food, and when they become sick begin to pour the medicine down them. The real way is to stick to proper food and be healthy and get along without medicine and expense.

spare chamber, nor the Robinsons, nor the Stuyvesants, and I am more troubled than ever. The decadence of the spare chamber strikes me deep." And why? Because it indicates a dying in grace, rather than growing in grace. In a certain family, where the several sons and daughters all grew up into noble Christian activity, the parents upon being asked the secret of their success in rearing their family replied: "We have given our sons and daughters high ideals by making it our custom to have noble and noted Christian people for our frequent guests."

There was the jailer at Philippi; so wonderfully did the Word of the Lord grow in his heart that all in the same night he passed from being a typical Roman jailer, whose sole thought was to keep his prisoners safe in order that he might not forfeit his own life, to being a baptized follower of the Lord Jesus, and so tender in his feeling toward his prisoners that he washed their bleeding stripes and set food from his own table before them. In the museum at Rotterdam is a rough, uninteresting painting—it is more a daub than a painting—and the keenest observer cannot discover any mark on it of genius or of skill. By its side hangs a masterpiece, whose value is almost beyond calculation. The artist of the two is the same—the renowned Rembrandt—and years of patient, earnest study and toil intervene between the two paintings. This is the usual way with the growth of Christian character.

A little child was found by his mother with his feet planted in the ground beside a sunflower stalk; when he was asked why he had placed himself so, he replied that "he wanted to grow and be a man quick!" The little fellow did not know how to grow. That is the way with a good many Christians: they sometimes get discouraged when they find themselves not growing faster, but instead thinking and doing the things which they thought they had forever left behind. We must regard the jailer at Philippi a miracle of grace. But it is not therefore incredible that he might afterward have had periods of discouragement with himself that he was not altogether a perfect man. God will not count us failures if only our motives are right.

Growing Lives

"I think William suffered from growing pain this morning," said grandfather. "William is growing in grace, but it pains him very much sometimes."

"What is growing in grace?" asked Oscar. "It is growing good, growing like Jesus," said the grandfather. "Did he grow this morning?" "I am sure he did. He wanted very much to ride with me. He knew his little brother and he could not both go, as there was but one empty seat in the carriage, so he went out under a tree and thought out something like this: 'I always have to give up to Oscar, just because he is little. I should think he might be taught to give up to me sometimes. I hate this giving up.' When William felt that way, he had a very bad growing pain indeed; it hurt him a long time, and then he said: 'I promised Jesus that I would try to be strong and kind to everything weaker than myself. I have a pony and a bicycle; let Oscar have the first ride with grandfather.'" "Why, grandfather, how did you know?" asked William. And grandfather replied: "Because I have had that kind of growing pain myself for thirty years."

Casting a Stone

A WOMAN was brought to the Master,
A woman with disheveled hair;
Her eyes had a look of beseeching,
Her face had a look of despair;
While fiercely the men that accused her
Demanded that judgment be given,
A smile on the face of the Master
Proclaimed that her sin was forgiven.

Though "Moses commanded to stone her,"
The Saviour who came from above,
To bring in a new dispensation,
Was full of compassion and love.
"Let him without sin from among you
Be the first who shall cast her a stone."
In silence of shame and confusion
They left them together—alone.

"Oh, woman, hath no man condemned thee?"
"No, Lord;" all her trial was o'er.
With strength for her weakness He bade her,
"Go, daughter, and sin thou no more."
Shall we who so oft have been tempted,
Who daily have wandered astray
While claiming the Christ for our Master,
Cast stones at the fallen to-day?

Our lives have been tenderly guarded
And kept from temptation and ill,
While others, less favored, have fallen,
Perhaps through a weakness of will.
Shall we who must ask of the Sinless
Forgiveness for sin o'er and o'er
Not say to the Magdalene near us,
"Go, sister, and sin thou no more"?

A Pageant for the Children

THERE are some three-quarters of a million children in New York who are looking forward with eager anticipation to their part in the Hudson-Fulton Celebration. A considerable sum of money has been set apart by the Celebration Commission for this purpose, and the special committee appointed to take charge of this feature of the festivities has been for some time established, with headquarters at the St. James Building, 1133 Broadway, New York, and 180 Montague Street, Brooklyn. The Children's Festivals Committee devotes its entire time to the work at general headquarters in Manhattan, and the assistant director is directing a staff of workers from the Brooklyn office of the committee. An elaborate programme for the participation of the children of the public and private schools, and of settlement houses, clubs and orphanages, has been mapped out and those in charge hope not only to provide a feature of great interest to the general public, but to stamp upon the minds of the rising generation the significance of the celebration as an object lesson in the early history of the city.

Wednesday, September 29, has been designated for memorial exercises in all the public and private schools. Saturday, October 2, has been set apart for the children's parades and carnival of play in all parts of Greater New York. The smaller as well as the larger public grounds will be thrown open within certain restrictions. The Children's Festivals Committee is organizing an efficient working corps, to spread interest as far as possible in every school district of the city and get in touch with the friends of children everywhere to prepare them for their play-pageant. Any child under sixteen may take part.

The city has been divided into pageant districts, and the co-operation and influence of the prominent residents in each are being personally appealed to, through letters and circulars, urging them to perfect organizations and bring the children into line. Many of these pageant districts are rich in historical and legendary lore connected with the early Indian, Dutch, English and Colonial periods of Greater New York. The object is to make the pageant in each district, as far as possible, representative from an historical point of view.

Daniel W. Metzler, of East Petersburg, Pa., passed away January 21, 1909, at the age of sixty-nine.

Mr. William Zule, of Leavenworth, Kan., died February 27. He was eighty-four years of age, and was a patient sufferer for many years.

On February 20 Nellie S. Bailey, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who for many years was a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was called higher.

Mrs. Mary A. Collins, of Canonchet, R. I., fell asleep in Jesus December 21, 1908, aged seventy-two years. Her life was filled with good works.

Mrs. L. M. Crockett, of New London, N. H., passed away recently, in the ninetieth year of her age. She had long been a subscriber to this paper.

Passed away March 15, 1909, Mrs. Maria Longmore, of Philadelphia, Pa., aged sixty-eight years, respected and loved by all who knew her.

Mrs. Mary W. Hanna, of St. Joseph, Mo., was called to rest recently, aged seventy-one years. She was a consistent Christian, a member of the Episcopal Church from early life.

Elder George Winand, of Abbottstown, Pa., was called higher on the 17th of February, in his eighty-second year. He was a faithful minister of the Baptist Church for many years.

OUR NATIONAL DISEASE
Caused by Coffee

Physicians know that drugs will not correct the evils caused by coffee, and that the only remedy is to stop drinking it.

An Arkansas Doctor says:

"I have been a coffee drinker for 50 years and have often thought that I could not do without it, but after many years of suffering with our national malady, dyspepsia, I attributed it to the drinking of coffee, and after some thought determined to use Postum for my morning drink.

"I had the Postum made carefully according to direction on the pkg., and found it just suited my taste.

"At first I used it only for breakfast, but I found myself getting so much better, that I had it at all meals, and I am pleased to say that it has entirely relieved me of indigestion. I gained 19 pounds in 4 months, and my general health is greatly improved.

"I must tell you of a young lady in Illinois. She had been in ill health for many years, the vital forces low, with but little pain. I wrote her of the good that Postum did me and advised her to try it.

"At the end of the year, she wrote me that Postum had greatly benefited her, and that she had gained 40 pounds in weight and felt like herself again."

Fall Painting

Means Economy and Winter Comfort

Winter is Hard on the Home. The rain and snow, sleet and ice penetrate unprotected surfaces, and when Spring comes moisture and decay have done their deadly work. Winter's mud grinds your floors. Winter's soot blackens your walls. Winter's steam discolors the finish of woodwork and furniture. Winter plays havoc with all surfaces of the home unless they are protected with the right paint or finish.

A coat of good paint now will protect your building. The proper finish will make your floors easy to clean and prevent them from wearing white. A coat of No-Lustre Finish will give your walls a beautiful finish, which can be kept clean by the occasional use of a damp cloth. Furniture and woodwork can easily be made soot-proof and moisture-proof by any inexperienced housewife.

Paul's Journeys Reviewed

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WE have seen how Paul was guided to Philippi, where there was no Jewish colony with a synagogue, as in so many of the cities in Asia, but only a little women's prayer meeting, hungering for the truth of God, the living Word; and here the first European church was quickly founded in the house of Lydia. And here the persecution, which always followed the preaching of the Word, broke out upon them, not from disputing and angry Jews, but first from heathen men whose income was in danger, because the poor possessed girl whose demoniacal oracles had brought them gain had been delivered from the evil spirit which possessed her. The enemy whose territory was thus disputed stirred up the multitude and the magistrates to scourge God's messengers, and to imprison them. But Satan was outwitted, for the mighty power of God in the earthquake which set them free justified God's witnesses and confirmed their testimony.

Thence Paul went westward through Amphipolis and Apollonia, until he came to Thessalonica. Here he found a synagogue, and here he was at home in his able reasoning with the elders from the Scriptures. It was ever the Word of God, not his own eloquence, in which he trusted. These Grecian Jews were familiar enough with the current Jewish theology about the Messiah as a coming King. Psalm 72 was a favorite Scripture with them, as also Isaiah 60 and 61, and all other Scriptures which speak of the coming reign of God's Messiah in glory upon earth. But jealousy prevailed, that this stranger should produce so great an impression, and again the teachers of the Word must fly for their lives.

Berea was their next stopping place, and here again Paul went into the synagogue, where he met with a better reception, "in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, examining the Scriptures daily whether these things were so. Many of them, therefore, believed." We next see Paul at Athens. Here there was no synagogue. There may have been many young Jews studying in the schools, many Jewish traders and merchants; but they had not set up a synagogue to preserve their knowledge of the Scriptures. Paul went from thence to the commercial city of Corinth, where he remained a year and a half, in spite of opposition, and for the first time separated the disciples from the synagogue, and gathered them together in the house of Titus Justus. Here he joined to him Aquila and Priscilla as helpers, and, leaving them in Ephesus, returned to Antioch.

Having spent some time there, he departed for his third and last missionary journey, going over for the third time the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, stablishing all the disciples. Meanwhile, Paul had commenced the writing of those inspired Epistles, which are now and have always been such a help to the Church of Christ. While at Corinth, after leaving Athens, he had written the first Epistle to the Thessalonians, and some months later, from the same place, the second Epistle to the Thessalonians. During the same period, while he made his lengthened stay, he wrote the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians. He had not yet been in Rome, but, being then the city which represented the great world power of the day, many people from all parts of the world had need to visit Rome; and, without doubt, many of the Christian converts of the various places he had visited were living in Rome, as we can gather from his numerous salutations.

Greatest Building Material Offer Ever Published!

$650 BUYS THE MATERIAL TO BUILD THIS HOUSE

¶ This is our Leader, the best seller of any house ever designed anywhere, by anybody, at any price. Why? Because it comes nearer to filling the requirements of a home than any house of its size ever built. It is 23 ft. wide and 33 ft. 6 in. long, not including the porch. It has seven rooms, bath pantry and a large front porch.

It is of handsome appearance and symmetrical proportions. It is magnificently lighted and perfectly ventilated. Embodies every modern comfort and convenience. Our extremely low price makes it the best bargain proposition on the market. We cannot recommend this design too highly. Even if you don't need a home, build this home for an investment. You can sell it ten times over before it's finished.

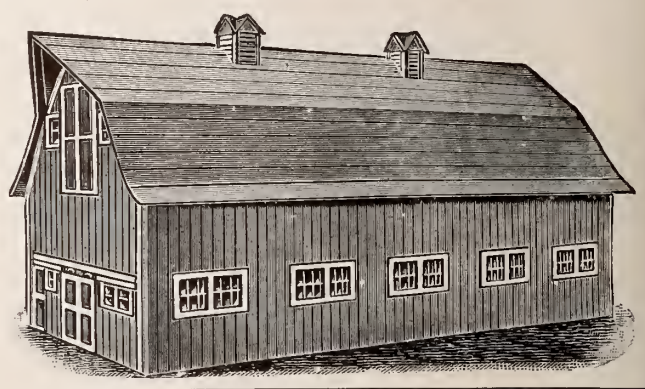
This is our house design No. 6; refer to it by number when you write.

$498 BUYS THE MATERIAL TO BUILD THIS BARN

¶ The above is an illustration of our famous Joist Frame Barn. It is the most practical and serviceable barn ever designed. It may be built at a price very much cheaper, and has more available space, than any other style. We can supply this barn in six different sizes, all of the uniform width of 36 ft. The above quotation covers a barn 36 ft. wide by 48 ft. long and 18 ft. high. The roof is of the self-supporting type, there being no posts in the hay loft. There are 6 windows on each side, 3 in each end, and 2 in each gable, so the barn is thoroughly ventilated.

Our price covers all the lumber, mill work, hardware and nails required to complete this building from the ground up. We can also furnish this design in larger sizes.

Refer to this Barn as Design No. 221



We Have Houses Ranging from $290 to $1,300, Barns from $200 up

¶ Of all wonderful offers advertised, this unquestionably is the greatest. The Chicago House Wrecking Company offers to sell you at a saving of from 25 to 50 per cent. all the building material needed to construct the house and barn shown above. This means we are absolutely leaving out all middlemen's profits and are dealing direct with the consumer. Our ideas are absolutely original, and no other firm in the world has ever before advertised to completely supply the material such as is offered herewith. We are the largest concern in the world selling lumber and building material direct to the consumer. We propose to furnish you everything for the construction of these buildings as outlined in our offer. It will be in accordance with specifications which are so clear that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Our prices as given above means for the material all correctly laid out in accordance with our plans and specifications.

¶ We will furnish you an itemized material list. We will also supply blue prints, architect's specifications and full information needed to properly and economically erect these buildings. This is not an experiment with us. During the past year, we have sold upwards of five hundred complete homes and barns. All the material is stored right in our main warehouse and yards at Chicago, ready to ship promptly upon receipt of your order. We guarantee every stick furnished to be absolutely brand new. Don't pay any attention to what jealous lumber dealers or unscrupulous merchants may tell you to the contrary. We would not dare to advertise any false statement. If you buy a building and receive any material that is in any way, shape or manner to the contrary of our general and specific representation, we guarantee to take back such material at our expense and replace it with material strictly in accordance with our description, or to refund you the full purchase price of same, or make such adjustment as meets your entire approval.

¶ As to our terms: They are as liberal as any one can ask for. If you do not want to send money in advance we will make shipment, to be paid for after it reaches destination, provided you furnish us with absolutely satisfactory bank references.

¶ Our literature explains, fully, our operations. On application we will furnish you the names of hundreds of satisfied customers in all parts of the country. On request we will quote a price delivered, freight prepaid, at your railroad shipping point, thus there will be no question as to the ultimate cost of the material. You will know all the facts before you buy. We are not asking you to buy a "cat in the bag." You will see what you buy with open eyes, and we will prove our terms are as liberal as you can possibly ask for.

¶ We secure many standard stocks of lumber, building material and merchandise at various forced sales, besides controlling large quantities of the lumber secured direct from mills in the North, South and Pacific Coast.

¶ Our yards cover over forty acres of land. Our institution is known everywhere. When you deal with us you are saving big money. Thousands have saved in the past and are now our steady patrons. It stands to reason that we are bound to give you a square, honorable deal. We are business men and recognize the meaning of a satisfied customer. If you deal once, you will buy from us often. Write for detailed information.

BLUE PRINTS FOR ANY OF OUR DESIGNS FREE to PURCHASERS

¶ We will furnish you blue prints for either of these designs or for any of the designs shown in our "Book of Plans" without one cent of cost to you, provided you place the order for the bill of material with us. It will be accompanied by working plans and material list. The itemized material list accompanying same is complete, both in the description of the material used and also in describing the purpose for which each item is intended. If purchased in the usual way from the architect, these plans would cost from $25.00 to $75.00. With the aid of our plans, specifications and material list, anyone reasonably familiar with building construction can superintend the erection of his own house or barn at a great saving.

¶ Our Plan Book, a description of which is given below, illustrates many other designs in houses and barns. You will find that our houses can be built for such purposes as will bring you in good returns for your money, even if you have no intention of living in the house yourself.

¶ If you buy the building material from us, at our specified prices, we will furnish you the plans, specifications and material list without charge. If, however, you prefer first to receive the plans and study the possibility of applying same for your own particular use, then we make you the following proposition:

¶ We will furnish you with a set complete for either of the buildings above or for any of the buildings shown in our "Book of Plans." referred to elsewhere in this advertisement, for the sum of $2.00, which amount you can remit to us and the complete set will be sent to you, all carrying charges prepaid by us. Upon receipt of them, if you decide to make the purchase of the full bill from us, then we will allow you $2.00 to apply towards our price. If for any reason you decide not to use the plans and prefer to return them to us within thirty days after receipt, then we will refund you $1.50, thus making the information cost you only 50 cents. We assure you this does not pay for the expense involved.

Hot Water Heating Plants, Steam Heating Plants, Plumbing Material

¶ We will furnish a complete Hot Water Heating Plant for the design No. 6, shown above, consisting of Sectional Hot Water Heater, handsome Cast Iron Radiators, all necessary pipe, valves and fittings, including a complete set of blue prints, working drawings and complete specifications, so simple that any ordinary mechanic handy with the use of tools can easily install plant. We will also loan the necessary tools needed in putting in such a plant. At the same time we will furnish you with a written, binding guarantee, covering 365 days, making you perfectly safe as to the quality of our material. We will supply all the above for the sum of $216.50; or we will furnish you a Steam Heating Plant, similar description as above, for the sum of $180.80. Every bit of material used in these plants is guaranteed brand new and first-class in every particular. We furnish all needed Plumbing Fixtures for House No. 6, shown in this advertisement, and consisting of Bath Tub, Closet, Washstand, Kitchen Sink, and including all necessary pipe and trimmings complete to install everything needed above the ground, for the sum of $97.50. Bathroom Outfit like illustration is $37.50.

¶ Any mechanic handy with the use of tools can install both the plumbing and the heating material in this house. We can also quote you prices for the installation of Plumbing and Heating for any of the designs shown in our "Book of Plans."

¶ We will furnish you the paint needed for House Design No. 6, shown above, including hard oil finish for interior, two coat work, and including porch floor paint, for $26.50.

¶ We will furnish a Hot Air Furnace outfit for design No. 6, full specifications of which will be furnished you, for $99.30.

LUMBER and BUILDING MATERIAL at 25 to 50 Per Cent. Saving

We say to you positively that no matter what your wants in the line of building material, we can supply it, and always at a saving. This statement is backed by any number of unsolicited testimonials from those who have taken advantage of our liberal offers of the past. Especially do we urge you to act now. Never in years has lumber been offered at such low prices as we are offering it for at the present time, and it is good lumber, too, first-class, right up to grade, and as good or better than that carried by any local dealer anywhere. Every stick of lumber that we sell is new. Nothing "wrecked" about it. It is as good as can be bought. We haven't a piece of second-hand lumber in our stock, and if we did have it we would not sell it by mail. We are selling only new, clean stock, no shop-worn material, and all our grades are guaranteed.

Then, our MILL-WORK. You cannot improve its quality. It's as good as anyone wants. It's better than 90 per cent. of the dealers have for sale. We can furnish you every single thing you may need in the line of Doors, Sash, Mouldings, Sideboards, Mantels, Interior Trim, or anything else. In other words, each and every article that comes into the construction of a building of any kind, and that includes also Structural Iron, Iron Beams, Iron Columns, or anything else in the iron line.

We have a complete stock of ROOFING MATERIAL, both tin, steel, iron and ready-roofing. We can furnish you shingles in all grades, everything in the way of plumbing and heating material. We can supply your wants in Builder's Hardware at a saving of 25 per cent. or more. We mean your Nails, your Builders' Hardware, and your Tools. And so it goes all the way down the line of material you need. We save you money everywhere, and the way to convince you of this fact is to have you submit to us a list of building material that you are in the market for. Let your carpenter or contractor, or whoever has charge of your building operations, hand us a list of the material you need, and we will give you a prompt estimate.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

M. D. R., Indianapolis, Ind. What is the present annual cost of supporting the armies and navies of the great European Powers?

Land forces: France $159,600,000, Germany $164,000,000, Russia $224,994,000, Italy $55,000,000, Great Britain $135,000,000, Japan $36,000,000, Austria-Hungary $67,000,000. Sea forces: Italy $28,000,000, Great Britain $161,000,000, Germany $75,000,000, Russia $45,000,000, France $66,000,000, Japan $16,000,000, Austria-Hungary $13,000,000. These are approximate figures.

Mrs. W. P., St. Mary, Ontario. 1. Is electrical treatment good for the nerves? 2. What kinds of food form the most healthful diet? 3. Is fish really valuable for brain food? 4. Should a mother, whose brain has been affected after the birth of one child, ever have another?

1. For some nerve affections electricity can be used with good results. For others, it is worthless. 2. A mixed diet of meat, grains, fruits and vegetables is prescribed by our best authorities. Meat is at present generally advised to be eaten not more than once a day in the lower latitudes. All foods should be well chewed, and liquids taken sparingly with meals, though pure water may be freely taken between meals. Made dishes, pastry, cakes and confectionery should be seldom eaten. 3. Authorities disagree concerning the value of fish as brain food, but as both fish and the brain contain much phosphorus it seems reasonable that fish supplies what the brain needs. 4. This question should be submitted to a competent physician.

R. P. L., San Francisco, Calif. 1. In Mark 2:26 did Jesus cite the name of the wrong high priest? 2. Please explain Deut. 15:21.

1. The passage in Mark 2:26 is capable of another interpretation, and, properly translated, would read: "In the time of Abiathar [the son of] the high priest," his father Abimelech being the high priest in charge of the temple. Abiathar himself afterward succeeded to the office, while David was still king. 2. It meant that the sacrifice or offering must in all respects be perfect.

Subscriber, New Rockford, N. Dak. I am a married man, and have no means of supporting my family excepting with my month's wages. Can my wages be garnisheed for debt?

No.

Mrs. C. E. T., Bucyrus, O. 1. What was the "forbidden fruit"? 2. Did Moses' wife and sons go with him to the Promised Land?

1. There have been many interpretations of the Fall, and the books on the subject would fill a small library. The majority of the early Christian fathers held the Mosaic account to be historical, and interpreted it literally, believing that an actual fruit of some kind, not definitely known, was eaten by our first parents. A few early writers, Philo among them, regarded the story of the Fall as symbolical and mystical, shadowing forth allegorical truths, and that the serpent was the symbol of pleasure, and the offense was forbidden sensuous indulgence. Whatever the "fruit" may have been, its use was plainly the violation of a divine prohibition, the indulgence of an unlawful appetite, the sinful aspiration after forbidden knowledge. Professor Banks, several years ago, while traveling in the region of the Tigris and Euphrates, found in a little known district a place which the natives declared to be the traditional site of Eden and a tree (name and species unknown) which they believed to be the successor of the original tree of knowledge, and it was venerated greatly. It bore no fruit. 2. None of those who set out from Egypt ever reached the Promised Land save Joshua and Caleb. The first generation of the Exodus all died in the wilderness (see Num. 26:65).

T. W., Longtown, S. C. Do the Jews of this present age baptize by sprinkling or immersion?

We have referred this question to Rev. Leopold Cohn, of the Williamsburg (N. Y.) Mission, who replies as follows:

The Jews of this present age, in receiving a Gentile convert to their religion and in carrying out their different laws of ceremonial purification, use immersion and never sprinkling.

S. F. E., Ventura, Calif. 1. Please explain Matt. 27:52, 53. 2. The Scriptures say, "Christ is the first fruits of them that slept." Lazarus and the widow's son at Nain died, and Christ raised them. Did they die again?

1. This passage has already been explained in THE MAIL-BAG. 2. Paul used the phrase figuratively, implying that, under the new Gospel dispensation of grace, and in view of Christ's finished work of redemption, he became the first fruits, no one before him having ever risen from the dead by his own act. In the physical resurrection of Lazarus and the widow's son, their bodies were not rendered fit for immortality at that time. It was a miraculous material resuscitation, a return of the

OF INTEREST TO YOU

DEAR FRIEND:—Our Fall and Winter Campaign is just opening. Owing to the improved condition of commercial and financial affairs, and the unprecedentedly large crops, this Christian Herald Campaign must be an unusually extensive and aggressive one, if we are to reap our share of the universal improvement.

One of the phases of our coming propaganda will be the sending out of an enormous edition of our Annual Circular, beautifully illustrated and printed in six colors and gold. The edition will probably reach 2,000,000, and to judiciously distribute so large a number we need more names and addresses of possible subscribers than we now have in stock.

To secure these names we appeal to our subscribers. Next to the publisher of this paper, they have the largest direct vital interest in the widening out of its sphere of influence and in the increase of its already enormous circulation list. They know what the paper stands for; they know the good it has accomplished; they know the benefit they and their families have derived from it in the past, and they believe, with us, that in the future it will be even better than in the past.

Now, to make a better paper we require a larger circulation. To get a larger circulation we must make the advantages of The Christian Herald known to as many people as possible, and to do this we ask you to co-operate with us, while we will surely make it worth your while.

Many, indeed most, of our subscribers would, we know, gladly co-operate with us to this end without hope of fee or reward. They would consider it a labor of love, in which they would cheerfully engage, and would send us the twenty-five names mentioned below, with their compliments and good wishes. However, we feel that it is but right and proper that we should offer them proper compensation for their trouble and expense, and we are making generous provision in that direction.

But we will not talk of compensation in this issue, as we hardly have space enough for that purpose. We will, however, say to you to-day: It is imperative that you

GET READY AT ONCE

Do not put this off until to-morrow—to-day is the day; to-morrow you may forget it. Remember that we will make it worth your while, and also remember that this offer is open only to our subscribers and their immediate families.

PLEASE read what follows below very carefully and then act at once.

Our Preliminary Announcement

NEXT WEEK we shall publish the details of a most interesting proposition, which involves on the one hand your sending to us twenty-five names of the character fully described below, and on the other hand our sending to you a very remuneative and exceptionally attractive Reward. This offer will be open only to our Subscribers and their immediate Families, and every list sent in must close with this declaration:

"I am a subscriber."

OR:—"My..... .....is a subscriber."

Here state relationship

and be signed by the name and address of the sender.

The names which may be sent in under this offer must be those of Adult Protestant Church or Sunday School Attendants, ☛ no two living in the same house.

These names must be written on only one side of the sheet. You may use more than one sheet in a single list, but you must not write on both sides of any sheet.

Every name must have a Prefix (such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Dr., Prof., Rev.), Christian Name (as Mary, John, etc.). Post Office Address, County, and State. In case of Free Delivery Office in city or country, either the Street Address or the number of the Rural Free Delivery route should be supplied.

Thus an address correctly supplied would read something like this:

Dr. James Potter, Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., 572 Adams Street

OR:—Miss Ruth Jackson, Westminster, Worcester Co., Mass., R.F.D. No. 6

We publish this preliminary notice to enable everybody to be prepared for immediate action as soon as our special and exceedingly attractive announcement reaches their hands. The offer will close within a very few days after the announcement and in sparsely settled districts the time allotted might prove insufficient were it not for this timely warning, which is equal to one week's additional notice. ☛ LOOK FOR IT IN THIS COLUMN.

We cannot too strongly urge upon our readers the advisability of securing BEFORE the Special Announcement appears the material for a prompt response, so that not a minute need be lost in sending in your list. DO IT TO-DAY AND DO IT AT ONCE. In this case there is no time like the present. We want these names for mailing our superbly Illustrated Holiday Circular, which will be off the press shortly. Your friends will thank you for getting their names on our mailing list and we will appreciate your kind co-operation. Address vital forces at the command of the Master of Life. Lazarus, according to tradition, lived thirty years after this event. Nothing can be asserted as to his later life, however, and there is no record of his end, nor that of the widow's son, although both no doubt passed away in due time.

E. A. S., Provincetown, Mass. Please explain the following passages: Amos 8:11; Gal. 1:8, 9.

1. This was to be a just retribution upon those who would not hear God's prophets and who even tried to drive them away. The time would come when they would look eagerly, but in vain, for holy men to give counsel and to reveal to them the divine will. 2. Paul was warning the Galatians against false teachers. He said substantially that, no matter who preached any Gospel antagonistic to that of Christ, such a preacher, even though he claimed to be an angel (he used this expression to show how absolutely unsupposable such a thing would be), would be anathema. Verse 9 reminds them that on a previous occasion he had used this same emphatic expression in speaking or writing to them on this subject.

J. P., Delanson, N. Y. Will you please inform me which is the harvest moon, and why so called?

The harvest moon is the full moon that falls nearest the autumnal equinox. The moon at that time is in that part of its orbit where it makes the smallest angle with the horizon, and thus rises at nearly the same time for a number of nights in succession. This gives an unusual proportion of moonlight evenings. The harvesters took advantage of this added light to complete their tasks, hence the name.

We have received numerous letters this week on the Federal tax stamp question in prohibition States, a subject which was ably discussed by Judge Hornblower in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 1. I. H., Leon, Ia., writes:

"I believe that it is a positive wrong for the United States government to issue license in the above manner, and that anything that would lead to the discontinuing of the same should be vigorously boosted."

W. C. S., Eldorado, Ill., calls attention to the fact that the subject under discussion, though a tax, is a license to all intents and purposes. C. H. H., Ansonia, N. Y., writes:

"Certainly, our government has no just right to nullify the laws of any State, and let us hope a new law by Congress will soon settle this matter forever."

I. J. G., Lawrence, Kan., writes:

"Would it not be more nearly in keeping with decency and order to first set about the repeal of our Federal law, under which we annually cram into our pockets $200,000,000? To embrace prohibition and urge its enforcement in the States, while refusing to recognize our responsibility for Federal internal revenue law, is only to breed discord and confusion where many of us most earnestly desire peace resulting from consistent action."

W. G. M., Cedar Falls, Ia., writes:

"The Federal Government in issuing a permit or license (or tax, if you please) in dry States and communities, where men and women for years have worked and prayed and some have even given their lives for prohibition, is putting a blot and a curse on our nation, which has pledged to its people to govern and enact laws that will help us as citizens and make it easy to do right and hard to do wrong."

QUEEN TITANIA(x) AND THE LADIES OF HER COURT AT THE ASBURY PARK CHILDREN'S CARNIVAL

SUMMER FESTIVAL BY THE SEA

AS the summer wanes the great seashore resorts take on a festival appearance. This year the preparations for the annual festivals at Asbury Park and Ocean Grove were on a more extensive scale, if possible, than in previous years. The mammoth auditorium at the Grove was filled to overflowing on the evening of August 25, to hear the sweet voices of a thousand children singing in the chorus choir arranged by Professor Tali Esen Morgan, who has been training them through the summer. The ten thousand auditors present united in praise of this eleventh annual Fairyland Festival as the best ever conducted at the great summer religious camping ground. It was a splendid and uplifting sight when the sixty-six musicians on the platform, with W. C. MacFarlane at the world's greatest organ, played a march while the children, in sections, marched up the aisles. First came the "gipsy girls," in red and yellow costumes; then the "American Indian maids" in another section. The smaller children followed, all dressed in white and holding green wands in their hands. Some of them looked like mere babies, and they called forth showers of applause, which continued when the little boy "Rough Riders," in khaki uniforms, brought up the rear of this great juvenile procession. Professor Morgan stood upon the platform, dressed in a white suit, looking the picture of happiness.

The stage setting, decorations and electrical effects were novel and beautiful. They represented a mountain-side, with snow-capped peaks, waterfalls and flowery dells. An illuminated Jerusalem cross hung on one side of the scene, and a red, illuminated heart on the other. Suspended from the roof were strings of snowballs and strips of red bunting. Thousands of Japanese lanterns were strung on wires from the vaulted ceiling, and in each an unlighted incandescent candle. A Wright aeroplane hung suspended in air in the centre. The machine was made of red bunting and surrounded by hundreds of electric bulbs. The children filled every available space on the seats back of the platform, and, with many red lights, presented a most striking picture. At a signal from Director Morgan, they all rose and sang the opening chorus, called "The Tale of a Sea-Shell." All the little singers entered heartily into the spirit of the occasion. It was like a scene from Fairyland as they waved the green scarfs attached to their shoulders. The soloist was Wilfred Morison, of Canada, a lad of thirteen. His voice, of remarkable sweetness and compass, filled the vast building. He sang "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's Creation, and "Beauty Sleep," by Arditi. Mrs. Hardin-Burnley, dressed in a girlish costume, won much applause by her humorous recitations. The children's choruses were well suited to them, and included "Hosanna," "Japanese Love Song," "Tragic Fall," "Raggedy Man," Tosti's "Good-By," "Carmina," etc. The finale was a Congress of Nations, in the form of a tableau. On a raised dais stood a maiden representing the Goddess of Liberty, holding a flag; another maiden in white stood beside her, also bearing a flag. They were surrounded by a group of girls, some in Grecian costumes. Below them were ranged the Indian girls and gipsy maidens, while the cadets in khaki stood at "attention." The trumpeters sounded "taps," and the children sang the old songs "Old Kentucky Home," "Old Folks At Home" and "Home, Sweet Home." Then all the lights in the Auditorium were lowered, and in an instant the thousand of Japanese lanterns shed out their beautiful colors in electric lights. An American flag, edged with electric lights, waved across the scene. This lovely scene, like fairyland, brought forth the enthusiastic applause of the audience and cheers for Director Morgan, who took no credit for all, but modestly said: "The children sang like angels." The ending of the programme was "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

The American "Indian Maidens" in the Great Festival at Ocean Grove, N. J.

Ocean Grove's near neighbor, Asbury Park, has also been holding its gala season, the most notable event being the Children's Carnival. Miss Henrietta Eiker was chosen as Queen Titania, and, accompanied by her six maids of honor and by Miss Alice Strowbridge, of Baltimore, Md., as Cinderella, the royal party took the lead in a brilliant aquatic pageant which attracted enormous admiring crowds. The carnival queen's reception to the 800 little tots, beautifully dressed, took the form of an entertainment, which included songs about stars, fireflies, birds and sunbeams. There were marches, music, picturesque canopied floats and a hundred other decorative touches that gave beauty and reality to the pretty illusion. The climax of the carnival was the baby parade on September 2. About 500 were in line in the daintiest of vehicles, and many prizes were awarded.

THE LONELY LIFE

TEXT—Prov. 14:10: "The heart knoweth his own bitterness: and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy."

THE thought of our age all runs in the direction of establishing the lines of connection between men, stating the points of contact, declaring our common humanity. Social science is laying hold of the oneness of the race, and sets forth the mutual relationships which exist between men. Human life, we are ever reminded, is not isolated. We are joined together with the subtlest and with the strongest bonds. There is no getting away from the situation, no cutting of the tie which connects us. The Christian truth, that we are members one of another, finds many illustrations in other levels of life. The well-being of one is a matter of congratulation for the whole; the ill-doing of one does damage to the condition of all. The truth of the apostle's words is being brought home to us, "No man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself."

We Are Part of a Larger Life

In our ordinary every-day relations with our fellows we soon learn that we must consider others whether we will or no. We live in families, in townships, in nations. There is always a larger life, of which we are a part. We have little patience with hermits, and no room for them. As a result, possibly, of the ever-increasing complexity of society, in our thinking to-day we do not consider men merely as individuals. Political economy views men's relationships and not men themselves. Politicans speak of classes and masses, and no longer of individuals. Even industry is organized into companies and combinations and trusts, with limited liability. This sinking of the single member in the society is undoubtedly the tendency of our day, and in some respects is a tendency which carries much hope of better things for the whole social condition.

But every such tendency has its corresponding danger, and here the danger is that we are inclined to forget that the society, however complex, is composed of individuals. In our glowing hopes of what may be done by social rules and laws affecting environment, we may forget that we are all moral beings, with heart and conscience and life of our own. We speak of the masses in a dim sort of way as a unity, but if you investigate their lives, if you follow them into their homes, you find that the masses consist of units, each, it may be, with his own heart's bitterness, and perchance sometimes with his own joys. The community of human life, which is being emphasized so much, is a lesson which bears repetition, our common ties and common duties and common responsibilities. But at the same time we dare not lose sight of the essential singleness of human life. Otherwise we have no moral appeal to make, and if men are not viewed as single individuals, with personal powers of intellect and heart, with a moral life and moral conscience, how can you even speak to them of ties and duties and responsibilities at all?

The Heart's Secret Places

The solitude of human life remains a solemn fact. Every man has a hermit life. There are crannies of his being into which no spying eye can peer, corners of his heart where the dust can gather undisturbed by stranger hands, passages of his soul sacred to his own memories of the past and his own experiences of the present, a holy of holies within guarded from trespass, a hermit's cell where the hermit can be alone. We are more than we ever express. We never fully explain ourselves. Even when we think we are opening up our nature to our fellows, something is kept back in spite of ourselves. We cannot express completely even a single phase of our nature or a single stage of our life. The words which we use to reveal ourselves tend, in a large degree, to conceal ourselves also. The complete reason for every smile or sigh is never stated by one of us.

This fact then remains, whether we are conscious of it or not, of the solitude of human life for weal or woe. We each have this life, we and none other. We can do much for each other; there are burdens we can share; we have powers of sympathy and love, which enable us to get out of self; we can rejoice with those who do rejoice and weep with those who weep; we can even love our neighbor as ourself—and yet there is a region in the depth of our nature shut to intruders, a limit at which we stop and say, "Thus far and no farther"; nay, there is a personality which, with the best will in the world, we cannot unveil to human eyes; there is a burden which every man must bear, and only can bear; there is a heart's bitterness which the heart alone can fully know, and a joy with which a stranger may not intermeddle.

Our Helplessness in Grief

This proverb of our text is a simple statement of a very familiar fact in every-day experience. We can see it, for example, in our helplessness in the presence of grief. If you want to feel your own littleness and to realize how empty words are, go into the presence of a great sorrow. You can only stand with bowed head, silent, and not attempt to patch grief with proverbs. However blessed sympathy is, we sometimes learn that there are wounds that go too deep for human help. Perhaps this inherent solitude of human life is seen more in sorrow than in joy. Joy tends to bring out our oneness in many respects. In joy we are in sympathy with all the bright side of nature, the birds and the flowers and the little children. We are in harmony with the pleasant ripple of the murmuring brook and the joyous rustle of the trees clapping their hands. Even a simple jest may be like the touch of nature, which makes the whole world kin. But sorrow makes the sorrowing quiver at the sound of outside rejoicings as at the lash of a whip. The contrast seems too painful. Why should the sun shine so blithely when all is dark within? "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow."

Perhaps this is the reason why sorrow will bring many a man to God whom joy would never bring. Pleasure while it lasts tends to breed self-sufficiency, but bitterness is a great destroyer of conceit.

> Eyes which the preacher could not school
> By wayside graves are raised,
> And lips say, "God be pitiful,"
> Who ne'er said, "God be praised."

Dumas, in his Memoirs, gives a pathetic instance of the contrast there may be between a man's outer and inner life. His first great triumph happened when his play Henry III. was received in Paris with a sensational ovation. His mother was dangerously ill, and at the end of each act he rushed home to see how she was. The night before he was obscure; the next morning he was the talk of all Paris. "How many people envied me my triumph that evening, who little knew that I passed the night on a mattress on the ground at the bedside of a dying mother!"

The Selfishness of Loneliness

This fact of the solitude of life, which we have been emphasizing and illustrating from common events, carries with it a real and strong temptation. There is the temptation to become self-centred, to brood over our own bitterness and exult in our own joy. The horizon of our emotions is limited at the best, and we are sometimes shocked at our own callousness. As a rule, we are interested in other people only in so far as they touch our lives. Selfishness is the sin of sins, and is possible because of the very dignity and power of concentration which gives us a separate existence. Yet we feel that, before the highest qualities of human nature are possible to us, that foe must be slain. We must get out of ourselves somehow, and must get into touch with other life. We must be drawn from our greatest sorrow, and be led to share our highest joy. The lonely life must be broken into somehow. In the face of all the dangers and sorrows and fears that menace life we need some source of comfort for ourselves and some source of strength for the service of others.

For a moment a man may be consoled by nature. As Byron said, who though a true poet was also a master of bombast:

> There is society where none intrudes,
> By the deep sea, and music in its roar.

But not for long is there comfort there. The poet who raved so much in his own great way about the woods and the sea and the mountains, who spoke of mingling with the universe and trusting the billows, who called the mountains friends and the ocean a home and said he found companionship in "the desert, forest, cavern, breaker's foam"—he came back from nature with ever the same sense of insufficiency gnawing at his heart. He came back to his fellow-men with his poor weak fretting unrelieved and his passion unstilled. To the end a bitterness, unsoftened by his wild, proud life, clung round his heart. In no mere nature worship, poetic reverie or artistic ecstasy, is there to be found heart's ease and the filling up of the aching void. Nature will only deepen the desolation unless we can get beyond it to the Presence which fills it, beyond nature to nature's God.

The Divine Companionship

The same ultimate failure waits all who substitute humanity for nature, who even throw themselves practically into all sorts of social service, who seek to deny the lonely life by cultivating all sorts of external relationships. It is the same sort of need which drives the lighter kind into endless social gaieties and frivolous dissipations. There is no real and lasting escape from the lonely life by any such external means. If they achieved all they promised, there would still remain that region in the depth of our nature of which we have spoken which is shut to all intruders. Human feet cannot stand there on the very threshold of the soul's abode. Into that holy of holies none can enter, even if he would. Flesh would perish there before that dread apocalypse of soul.

But this constant craving of man for companionship, even in the lonely life, even in the valley of the shadow, is surely not disregarded. It is there that God meets him, there in that holy of holies of the heart, shut to every other visitant. Life in its ultimate issue is lonely, because we were made for a higher companionship. Our Lord felt this solitude of human life, and looked forward at the last calmly to the time when he should be left alone, and could add, "And yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me." This, too, is the solution for us, and in the loneliest places of life we may find the heart's bitterness and joy, which brought the pain of solitude, turned into holy and blessed sacraments. There is divine comfort for human sorrow, divine healing for human wounds, divine forgiveness for human sin, divine help for human temptation, divine love for human loneliness.

The Christ-Life the Solution

This is the message of religion. This is Christ's offer, to satisfy the ultimate needs of our nature. In his love, bitterness is lost and joy is shared. In his service the life is stripped of its selfishness. He may have to lead us out of ourselves through sorrow, and if we follow he will lead us out of our sorrow through sympathy. In him we reach out into a truer and fuller life. Through Christ we reach Christ's brethren. He himself graduated in the school of pain, and trained himself for his office, and can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. Communion with him satisfies our deepest needs and prepares us for the highest service. The lonely life is lost in the Christ life.

No success, or gain, or comradeship, or earthly love can make up for emptiness here in that inner sanctuary of life where the soul can meet with God. The hour comes to all when we must know that "vain is the help of man," when we too must be alone in the lonely life. Surely our house is left to us desolate if we have no knowledge of a gracious Companion—if we cannot say, "Not alone, for the Father is with me." What shall it profit if, with all your striving and seeking and getting, you miss the one thing that can satisfy? What shall it profit if you are left with your own heart's bitterness and your pathetic make-belief of joy?

HOW I FOUND THE NORTH POLE

Dr. Frederick A. Cook's Own Story by Cable of His Remarkable Arctic Journey

LERWICK, Shetland Islands, Wednesday, Sept. 1.

AFTER a prolonged fight against famine and frost we have at last succeeded in reaching the North Pole.

Land has been discovered upon which rest the earth's northernmost rocks.

A triangle of 30,000 square miles has been cut out of the terrestrial unknown.

The yacht Bradley arrived at the limits of navigation in Smith Sound late in August, 1907.

At sunrise of 1908 (February 19) the main expedition embarked for the pole. Eleven men and 103 dogs, drawing eleven heavily loaded sledges, left the Greenland shore and pushed westward over the troubled ice of Smith Sound.

As we crossed the heights of Ellesmere Sound to the Pacific slope the temperature sank to 83 degrees below zero Fahrenheit. Several dogs were frozen and the men suffered severely, but we soon found game trails along which an easy way was forced through Nansen Sound to the land's end.

On March 18 six Eskimos returned from here, with four men and forty-six dogs, moving supplies for eighty days.

The crossing of the circumpolar pack was begun three days later. Stuckshook and Ahwelsh, the two best men, and twenty-six dogs were packed for the final dash. There was before us an unknown line of 460 miles to our goal.

The big lead which separated the land ice from the central pack was crossed with little delay.

On March 30 the horizon was partly cleared of its smoky agitation, and over the western mist was discovered a new land.

The observations gave our position latitude 84 deg. 47 min., longitude 86 deg. 36 min.

Here were seen the last signs of solid earth.

We advanced steadily over the monotony of a moving sea of ice.

We now found ourselves beyond the range of all life.

Observations on April 8 placed our camp at latitude 86 deg. 36 sec., longitude 94 deg. 2 sec.

We were now about 200 miles from the Pole and the sled loads were reduced. One dog after another had gone into the stomachs of his hungry survivors.

Beyond the eighty-sixth parallel the ice fields became more extensive and heavier, the crevices fewer and less troublesome, with little or no crushed ice thrown up as barriers.

From the eighty-seventh to the eighty-eighth, much to our surprise, was the indication of land ice.

For two days we traveled over ice which resembled a glacial surface.

Observations on the 14th gave latitude 88 deg. 21 min. and longitude 95 deg. 52 min.

We were now less than one hundred miles from the Pole.

Signs of land were still seen every day, but they were deceptive illusions or a mere flight of fancy.

The mirages turned things topsy turvy. Inverted mountains and queer objects ever rose and fell in shrouds of mystery, but all of this was due to the atmospheric magic of the midnight sun.

On April 21 the first corrected altitude of the sun gave 89 deg. 59 min. 46 sec.

The Pole, therefore, was in sight.

We advanced the fourteen seconds, made supplementary observations and prepared to stay long enough to permit a double round of observations.

Etukishook and Ahwelab were told we had reached the "Neig Nail" and they sought to celebrate by an advance of savage joys.

At last we had pierced the boreal centre and the flag had been raised to the coveted breezes of the North Pole.

The day was April 21, 1908. The sun indicated local noon, but time was a negative problem, for here all meridians meet.

With a step it was possible to go from one part of the globe to the opposite side.

From the hour of midnight to that of midday the latitude was 90, the temperature 83 and the barometer 29.83.

North, east and west had vanished. It was south in every direction, but the compass pointing to the magnetic pole was as useful as ever.

After all the observations had been taken with a careful study of the local conditions, a sense of intense loneliness came with the further scrutiny of the horizon.

What a cheerless spot to have aroused the ambition of man for so many ages!

An endless field of purple snows. No life. No land. No spot to relieve the monotony of frost. We were the only pulsating creatures in a dead world of ice.

We turned our backs to the pole on April 23 and began the long return march. Counting on a continued easterly drift, the course was forced further west.

Below the eighty-seventh parallel the character of the ice changed very much, and it became evident that the season was advancing rapidly.

It now became evident that the crucial stage of the campaign was to be transferred from the taking of the Pole to a final battle for life against famine and frost.

On May 24 the sky cleared long enough to give us a set of observations.

We had reached the eighty-fourth parallel near the ninety-seventh meridian. The ice was much broken and drifted eastward, leaving many open spaces of water.

At the end of a struggle of twenty days through thick fog the sky cleared and we found ourselves far down in Crown Prince Gustav Sea, with open water and impossible small ice as a barrier between us and Heiberg Island.

Early in July further southward progress became impossible, and in quest of food we crossed the Firth of Devon into Jones Sound.

With but an occasional bird to eat and a long line of misfortunes we pushed eastward until the frost of early September stopped progress.

Pressed by hunger, new implements were shaped, and Cape Sparbo was picked as a likely place to find life.

Game was located with the bow and arrow, the line, the lance and the knife. An underground den was prepared, and in it we remained until sunrise of 1909.

On February 18 the start was made for Annootok. With a newly prepared equipment, the Greenland shores were reached on April 15.

THE EXPLORER'S PREPARATIONS

DR. FREDERICK A. COOK'S wonderful journey and his crowning achievement in reaching the geographical North Pole on April 21, 1908, are only partially told in his intensely interesting cable dispatch from Lerwick. When his journal with his full record of observations is given to the world it will, according to the opinions of scientists, fully establish his claim to the great discovery.

Dr. Cook, who is forty-four years old, is a native of Callicoon, N. Y., an American of German parentage. He has spent many years in Arctic search, having been connected with five different expeditions before the present one. His latest and successful venture was financed by Mr. John R. Bradley, a wealthy New Yorker, who provided the means for equipping a suitable vessel. There was a three-years' food supply, abundant fuel, a house for winter quarters, and complete sets of scientific instruments. One odd feature of the commissariat was a barrel of gumdrops for the Eskimos.

It was in July, 1907, that Dr. Cook decided on the journey he has just finished so successfully. He planned everything with the utmost deliberation, mapping out his course with a view to a winter dash for the Pole, instead of a summer attempt, which almost all earlier explorers had chosen. He chose for his crew men of ripe experience in Arctic voyaging and his Eskimos were all picked men, while his dogs, sledges, etc., were the best obtainable. Mr. Bradley affirms that few, if any, Polar expeditions have been so completely and satisfactorily equipped as that of Dr. Cook. The vessel, which was named John R. Bradley, after its owner, was fitted with powerful gasoline engines. On reaching Etah, final preparations were made; the natives had an abundance of winter food already stored, and the whole outlook was considered favorable. Winter quarters were established. When Mr. Bradley left for home, the whole party were amply provided for the Polar dash and were in good spirits. Dr. Cook proposed to spend the time until midwinter in preparation, and then lay out a course across the ice of Smith Sound, which he believed would be frozen solid. He would start in January or February, 1908, and go northwest through Ellesmere Land and try to strike the Polar Sea at 83 degrees north latitude, making his sled outfit for the dash as light as possible. He hoped to come out by way of Nansen Sound. The HERALD'S cable dispatch, printed above, gives the explorer's own graphic story of the dash and its fortunate sequel.

It is reported that Dr. Cook's scientific records and observations, taken on his perilous trip, have been received at Copenhagen, and that they are complete and satisfactory, confirming his discovery of the geographic pole. The press of two continents is praising the courage and skill of the explorer, who will be showered with honors for his wonderful achievement.

HOME AND FOREIGN TOPICS OF INTEREST

—"THE SWING to Pantheism" is the latest characterization of Dr. Eliot's "New Religion," which is now regarded as being largely identical with "monism," which teaches that the "whole universe is one thing, one reality, one substance," and that all the things we see are variations of the one universal thing. Whence (aptly remarks the Interior) it is easy to proceed to call that one thing God—which is pantheism. The Doctor's philosophy seems to be dissolving in definitions.

—AN ENGLISH WRITER, Mr. Ben Tillett, has stirred up something of a sensation by a recent article headed "A Tea-Sodden England," in which he contends that the health and vigor of the nation are being sapped by tea drinking. He declares that "the deadly poison of tea is working havoc among the people, filling lunatic asylums, manufacturing unemployables, and bringing in a host of nervous diseases." He points to a circular issued by the War Office to girl typists in its employ, cautioning them against excessive tea drinking, especially between meals and with lunch, as provocative of heart troubles and nerve disorders.

—STANLEY ROBERTS, a young theological student and preacher, heroically gave his life to save his friend, Henry C. Myers, at Hempstead Bay, N. Y., a few days ago. Myers had swam beyond his depth, and was drowning when Roberts went to his rescue. Myers clutched him by the throat, but the brave swimmer succeeded in bringing him to shore, where he himself sunk down and died soon afterward. Roberts was twenty-four years of age, and had preached for several weeks in a little Baptist Church in Freeport, N. Y. He and Myers had been fast friends.

—IT HAS BECOME a favorite theme with magazines and weeklies to discuss various more or less alluring plans for fighting off old age. Some popular scientists have even lent their countenance and their pens to this discussion and have encouraged the hope that the secret of long-continued, if not perpetual, youth is at last within human reach. Alas! that this beautiful illusion should so soon be dispelled! Dr. Menard, a celebrated French physician, has published an apparently conclusive scientific argument against it. He declares that every one is as old as his arteries and his organs; that dietary, exercise, massage, transfusion, or physical operation can only produce a temporary and extremely limited effect. Though these may retard age slightly, the ravages of years are irreparable and we must resign ourselves to becoming old.

—DURING THE LAST twelve months some remarkable archæological finds have been made in Egypt by Professor Flinders Petrie. One is a clay gaming-board, which was found in a grave that was dug "before there were kings in Egypt." In other predynastic graves, near Abydos, were found little figures of men and women, and bowls and vases, some of them over 3,500 years old. The silver head of a goddess was estimated to be 4,400 years old, and several heads of different racial types were from a period of about 500 B.C. One beautifully carved piece was the terra-cotta figure of a girl kneeling, with some kind of a vessel or urn upon her knee, which is as minutely finished as an ivory carving. Professor Petrie believes it to belong to the eighteenth dynasty, about 1550 B.C.

THE HUDSON-FULTON CELEBRATION

FROM September 25 to October 9 the State of New York, under the auspices of the Hudson-Fulton Celebration Commission, will commemorate with appropriate exercises the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Hudson River by Henry Hudson and the hundredth anniversary of steam navigation upon the same river by Robert Fulton. It was in 1807 that the father of the steamboat sent the Clermont on her momentous voyage to Albany, but as the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Hudson came so soon after it was decided to celebrate the two events together. While the celebration will take place in New York City and along the Hudson Valley, yet the people of the whole country are taking a lively interest in the preparations which have been made for it. The discovery of the Hudson River and the successful application of steam to navigation were local events, but their influence is not only national but international, and, realizing the importance of the celebration, many European countries will be represented by fleets of warships.

History, unfortunately, tells us little about the hardy navigator who, three hundred years ago, entered what is now New York harbor and sailed up the river that now bears his name. Henry Hudson was born in London, or its immediate vicinity, but in what year is not known. When he made his memorable voyage in 1609 he was under contract with the Dutch East India Company, of Amsterdam. It is interesting to note that the company offered the explorer $320, the equipment of a ship, and a further sum of $80 to be paid his family in England in the event of his losing his life on the voyage. Hudson closed the contract, and on April 4, three hundred years ago, set sail from Amsterdam on De Halve Maene, or Half Moon, to find a northwest passage.

The part that Fulton played in the development of steam navigation will be fully commemorated. A replica of the Clermont was launched at Staten Island recently. Mrs. Arthur Taylor Sutcliffe, a great-granddaughter of Fulton, christened the boat by breaking across her bow a bottle of spring water from Clermont-on-the-Hudson. The bell, which a hundred years before had called prospective passengers on board, was rung, and amid the firing of guns and the blowing of whistles the hull of the new Clermont slid slowly into the water.

The people of Holland have built a reproduction of the Half Moon. The new Half Moon arrived in New York on July 22, on the steamer Soestdyk. A full account of this remarkable boat appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 11. She is now being rigged at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, under the direction of an officer of the Dutch Navy. Lieutenant Commander W. Lam, R. D. N., will take the part of Hudson, and Lieutenant de Meester will act as mate. The crew will be Dutch sailors, dressed in the costume of Hudson's day. When the Half Moon and Clermont start up the Hudson to the Palisades from the lower harbor in the naval parade on September 25 they will have an escort such as never has been seen afloat in this or any other country.

There will be in the line of warships, leading the parade, fifty-four gray ships of our own superb fleet, and four black cruisers from Great Britain under Admiral Hamilton, who will act as special representative of his country to the celebration. Holland, which feels especial pride in the event, will send a fleet of several cruisers; Germany, France and Italy will also have ships in line. Mexico and most of the South American countries will have a ship each. A gay procession of steamers and merchant ships will follow the warships, making a total number of one thousand vessels in line. All available craft from Norfolk to Boston have been hired for this naval parade.

The fleet will anchor off the upper part of the city from Fiftieth to One Hundred and Fifty-seventh Street. That evening will occur the first illumination of the city, and for the seven nights following New York will be the most brilliantly lighted city in the world. Conservative estimates place the number of lights to be used, in addition to the regular lighting facilities of the city, at 26,260,000 candle-power. And this does not include the hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of contracts already signed by advertising and display companies for private owners, nor any of the lights on the Jersey shore or the immediate vicinity of the greater city. At One Hundred and Tenth Street and Riverside Drive there will be a battery of searchlights, so powerful that when all their rays are brought together in one stream the light will be visible for at least fifty miles.

A grand fireworks display will be given from floats anchored near the Jersey shore, in honor of the foreign and American warships, on September 25. The fireworks displays contracted for by private owners and towns along the Hudson will make the river as light as day. It remains, however, for the closing night of the celebration to furnish the most magnificent and gorgeous spectacle. From the Battery of New York to Troy, a distance of one hundred and fifty-one miles, the great stream will be lined with lights of all descriptions. At prominent points along the river signal fires thirty feet high will be placed, and will all be started at once, at a given electrical signal from President Taft.

On Sunday, September 26, the churches of New York will pay a fitting tribute to the great men in honor of whom this celebration is held.

Public and private buildings are to be decorated in New York and all towns along the river on September 27. Official guests will be received by General Leonard Wood, at the headquarters of the Department of the East on Governor's Island. On this day there will be a notable exhibition of early Dutch masterpieces of the time of Hudson or before, among which are priceless canvases by Rembrandt and other great painters, all owned by Americans. It will be under the auspices of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and will continue for several months. Special exhibits of prints, models and relics will also be opened at the American Museum of Natural History, the Hispanic Museum, the Numismatic Society, the New York Public Library, and other similar institutions throughout the State. During the day the great contest between the aviators of all nations will commence. There will be several flights over the city and a race to Albany. Among those who will enter their flying machines are Glenn H. Curtiss, who won two prizes at the recent tournament in the air at Rheims, in France, and Captain Thomas S. Baldwin, who has constructed an airship especially for this contest. As any one who has not made at least three successful flights prior to this contest will be refused entrance, only the best types of airships will be seen.

On Tuesday, the 28th, will come the first of the great land parades. This will be an historical pageant. The floats have been highly praised by experts. The command of the parade and building of these floats is under the direction of Captain A. H. Stoddard, who for nineteen years held the same position at the New Orleans Mardi Gras. The designer was the late B. A. Wickstrom, who on April 26 died at work at his easel.

Historical and carnival floats have been built. Fifty of each will be in the two parades of September 28. There will be, first the historical procession, composed of floats and tableaux representing the history of the Indian, English, Revolutionary and American periods. Months have been devoted to study to get the costumes historically correct, and each one worn will be made to order, of the silk and satins used in the time they represent.

The evening of this day will be given up to the official literary exercises, to be held at the Metropolitan Opera House, the great hall of the City College, Carnegie Hall and the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, where orations will be delivered by men of national reputation. Memorials to great Americans will be dedicated throughout the city and State, for the commission would have the history of the Hudson Valley written in stone and bronze from the mouth of the river to its source. Through the generosity of Mr. C. K. G. Billings a mural tablet is to be placed on the spot where once stood old Fort Tryon. The dedication will be under the auspices of the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society. Here the Americans made a gallant defense against the Hessian troops at the northern outwork of Fort Washington. Not a great distance from here, on Spuyten Duyvil Creek, near where Hudson and his crew engaged the Indians, the cornerstone has been laid for the Henry Hudson monument.

Wednesday is Educational Day. Schools, universities, museums, learned and patriotic societies throughout the entire State will participate. Free lectures for the people of New York City will be given by the Board of Education.

On Thursday, September 30, will occur the great military parade. It is expected that from 30,000 to 40,000 men will be in line. The sailors from the foreign and American warships will be landed, and there will be a large division of United States regulars. Militia regiments from almost every Eastern State, North and South, will give the parade a truly national character.

The following day, October 1, will see a most imposing naval parade. The Half Moon and Clermont, with their escort of men-of-war, will proceed up the Hudson as far as Newburgh, where they will be met by a flotilla from Albany. At the same time that the lower Hudson fleet of excursion boats and river craft leaves Manhattan Island a fleet of smaller ones will start from Albany.

On October 2 the "lower Hudson" week will end. The New York division of the naval parade will return to its starting point. The Daughters of the Revolution will dedicate an arch at Stony Point battlefield. The grand carnival parade, with fifty carnival floats, will be held in the evening in New York City.

It is planned to devote the week beginning Sunday, October 3, to celebrations in towns along the Hudson, north of New York City. This will be somewhat in the nature of an "old home week." Sunday the fleet will start, with the Half Moon and Clermont, on a trip to Troy, which will require about a week to make. Stops will be made at the various county seats along the river.

On October 4 the ships will anchor off Poughkeepsie, while that town unveils a statue to Robert Fulton. The next day the naval parade will be at Kingston, where a statue to Governor Clinton will be unveiled.

The next stop, on October 6, will be made at Catskill, the county seat of Greene County, where the inhabitants are to commemorate the memory of Rip Van Winkle by dedicating a statue to that popular worthy.

Another Hudson statue will be seen for the first time at Hudson, the county seat of Columbia County.

The 8th of October will see the celebration in full sway in Albany, the oldest city in the State. There will be unveiled a monument to Peter Schuyler, the first Mayor of Albany.

The last day of the festival has been reserved for Troy. A statue will be dedicated to the Van Rensselaers, who obtained the land grant in the last stronghold of the patroons.

MONTEREY AFTER THE FLOOD

Thousands Made Homeless, and Appeal Through American Consul for Relief

Consul-General Hanna

MOST of the disasters of recent years, where multitudes have perished, have occurred in foreign lands, and our own continent has been comparatively free from loss of life by earthquake and flood. Consequently, the harrowing news from Monterey, in Mexico, sent a thrill of horror and of sympathy through the hearts of the American people. The more recent reports from the flood-stricken city paint the scenes witnessed there in even darker colors than the first dispatches, which, as a usual thing, are somewhat exaggerated. In the case of Monterey, however, the loss of life and the loss of property has proved to be at least double that which was at first reported, and the sufferings of thousands who have been bereft, in two short days, of home, relatives and the very means of gaining a livelihood, have stirred the sympathetic people in all parts of Mexico and the United States.

The connection between Monterey and the United States has been particularly close. It is the first city of importance reached by the American traveler from Austin and San Antonio, after he has crossed the line and entered the State of Nuevo Leon, and its picturesque houses of adobe, which from their flimsy construction sealed the fate of their occupants, have given the tourist his first idea of what a Mexican city really is.

Monterey had been growing in size and in prosperity in recent years, and a number of American business houses had established connections there. The greater part of the Mexicans were trading with the United States. In fact, eighty-eight per cent. of all the business of Monterey and its immediate vicinity was done with American firms. As not a single business house or store in all Monterey escaped inundation, the loss in business will be a staggering blow to this thriving community.

In the first report from the flooded district, a brief outline of which was printed in the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the financial loss was estimated at $15,000,000; now it is thought that $30,000,000 is a moderate estimate. The great loss of life was principally among the poorer classes of the city, who lived along the river banks, especially on the south side.

As soon as the extent of the disaster became known, the proprietor of this paper promptly sent a telegram to the American Consul-General, Philip C. Hanna, who was taking an active part in the relief work, offering the assistance of this paper and of its readers in relieving the distress of the thousands now left homeless and who were threatened at the same time with famine and pestilence, which always stalk like grim spectres, hand in hand, in the wake of a devastating flood.

The following reply was received from Consul-General Hanna:

"Monterey, Mexico, August 31.

"Dr. Louis Klopsch, Christian Herald, New York:

"Flood disaster is as terrible as reported in press reports. Thousands homeless. Suffering must continue for months to come. Assistance will be appreciated. (Signed) PHILIP C. HANNA."

The following reply was immediately telegraphed:

"Hanna, Consul-General, Monterey, Mexico:

"Will honor your sight draft for $1,000 as our first contribution toward relief of stricken people of Monterey. LOUIS KLOPSCH."

The Consul-General at once telegraphed his grateful acknowledgment of the money, and it is already being employed in buying food and clothing for the destitute.

Hardly in history do we know of a flood coming with such unexpectedness, if we except the Johnstown flood of twenty years ago. Monterey, as a usual thing, has had difficulty in getting enough water to exist on. The bed of the Santa Catarina River, which winds down from the mountains, in summer is as dry as a bone, and the gaunt arches of the bridges have spanned no water except at certain periods of the year. The district has been suffering from drought for over fourteen months, and rain, above all other things, was most desired by the people of the province of Nuevo Leon. Naturally, when a rainstorm came several weeks ago, there was much rejoicing. Then there was a dry period, and on the evening of August 27 the rain began to fall, gently at first, and then increasing to a downpour. The people expected it would be but a brief storm, and were glad that the drought was broken. When they went to sleep in their adobe houses a good stream of water was rushing along the river bed beneath the arches of the bridges and the flimsy roofs of some of the houses had begun to leak, but no alarm was felt. Those who were wakened later by the thunder of the torrents of water which seemed to fall in one great sheet on adobe walls and the city pavement began to get uneasy. Never had such a storm occurred in Monterey. When the bolder looked out, the city lights had disappeared; the blackness of the night was terrible, and the water was pouring along the streets as if they were soon to become a part of the Catarina River itself.

From the direction of the river came the alternate boom and roar of the flood. The water surged against the structures of the river banks, shaking them as if they were but paste and cardboard. Neither river banks nor buildings could withstand the fearful attack of the assaulting waves. Great sections of earth were carried away, walls toppled, and the houses were crushed like egg shells, the wreckage bearing down stream in a tangled and ever-increasing mass. Engulfed in the angry waves or caught in the debris were hundreds of hapless people who, realizing their danger too late, were unable to make their escape to upper parts of the city, to which terror-stricken men and women were making their way.

The river rose until the city was flooded along its entire length and for several blocks inland. The houses which had not been engulfed were half covered with water, and the panic-stricken occupants had rushed to the roofs.

The entire city became alarmed before daylight. Most of the people who lived anywhere near the river left their houses and ran to the public squares and swarmed into the churches. There in prayer knelt mothers who had lost their children, men who had lost wives and little ones. In some cases they were in an agony of doubt whether they were dead, rescued or merely lost in the night of terror which had settled like a black pall over Monterey.

Morning came, but the rain never ceased; at times it seemed to increase in violence. The people made their way to the river banks, or rather the edge of the lake, which was boiling through the city. For several blocks inward from the former bed of the river every house had disappeared. For nearly four miles this was the condition of affairs; the front of the city had been literally shaved off. Here and there a lone water-soaked structure still made good its stand against the flood, but whether it contained some hapless family could not be made out.

Many brave attempts at rescue were made in the flooded districts. Rafts were improvised, as the city had but few boats to meet such an emergency. Probably there were not twenty boats in all Monterey before the storm began, and most of these were carried down stream in the flood before there was enough light to carry on the work of rescue.

The bridges were broken, cutting the city in two. The water in some places had risen twenty or twenty-five feet.

The storm continued for two days and a half. Then it began to slacken, and relief efforts were at once begun by the Mexicans and foreign residents.

View of Monterey Taken Before the Disaster

Many Buildings Shown Have Been Swept Away

Consul-General Hanna was one of the most active in relieving the distressed. He placed sewing machine in the consulate, where volunteers quickly stitched up simple cotton dresses for the women and girls. Thousands are in great need of clothing. They escaped from their homes fortunate in the possession of one garment or with a water-soaked blanket. Churches, public buildings, private homes were all thrown open to shelter the unfortunates, but in the great confusion and terror during the two days' storm there were hundreds who were unable to find or reach shelter, and stayed out in the downpour for forty-eight hours. The deaths from colds and from pneumonia must, in the end, reach a high figure. The Consul-General and the American Association paid out considerable sums for the purchase of food and clothing, but the crying need of thousands which were on every hand was enough to appall the stoutest heart. Reports from the lower reaches of the river were slow in coming in, but they all showed that there had been great loss of life. Probably there were swept away from the city alone sixteen hundred people. The exact number may never be known. The bodies were carried for miles in the rush of waters, others were buried in the masses of wreckage or concealed by the mud which had been brought down from the mountains by every rivulent and creek. An epidemic of typhoid will probably follow the subsidence of the water, which will leave the mud flats with their polluted pools exposed.

It was impossible to bring in food or supplies from other parts of Mexico or from the United States, for the railways had been washed away. Every effort was made to repair them, for the city was short of food. The authorities took charge of bakeries and markets, in order to make the distribution of supplies as equitable as possible, but even with this precaution there has been much suffering. So great is the extent of the disaster, says Consul-General Hanna, that the unfortunates will endure hardships and there will be much suffering for months to come. The plight of the little children who have lost their parents is pitiable.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly receive contributions for the sufferers in Monterey and vicinity, and the money will be at once forwarded by the proprietor to Consul-General Hanna, who will personally see that it is used promptly and effectively. These people who are suffering from lack of food and clothing are geographically our near neighbors, and their cry for help should find a ready response in the generous hearts of the American people, who have never yet turned a deaf ear to the appeal of the hungry and needy in any land. This time the call for aid comes so near that the response cannot be any but a liberal one. All contributions will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Monterey Needs Our Help

IN the awful flood that overwhelmed the ill-fated city of Monterey, Mexico, carrying down to death nearly one thousand six hundred human beings and destroying $30,000,000 in property, we are face to face with one of those sudden calamities before which man stands absolutely helpless. Only an earthquake could have been more sudden and terrible than the swift rush of waters which engulfed the Mexican city on the night of August 27. How quick was the transition from joy to mourning! Who can tell of the agony, the fierce battle for life that marked that night of terror and darkness? Next day, there were the leveled buildings, the dead everywhere, the living thousands, homeless and destitute; hundreds of orphan children wandering around, looking for the parents they will see no more.

On the first news of the disaster, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD telegraphed to Consul-General Hanna, and his reply is published on another page of this issue. In response to his appeal for the ten thousand homeless—many of them Americans—and the orphan children, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD immediately telegraphed to Consul-General Hanna to draw on him for $1,000 to begin relief work. That remittance is now being used to feed many of the sufferers, who come to the consulate in crowds, appealing for bread to satisfy the cravings of hunger. There are many thousands who will have to be cared for during the next few months.

We invite all of our readers to do what lies in their power to assist this relief work among our near neighbors, and the American sufferers in Monterey. Let each give an offering promptly, and many lives will be saved and much suffering averted. This is a real opportunity for Christian service—a privilege not to be neglected. Send your gift to-day to "Mexican Relief Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York." Every gift, large or small, will be acknowledged in these columns.

The Polar Discovery

THERE is something to stir every pulse in the news, given to the world through the exclusive enterprise of The New York Herald, of Dr. Frederick A. Cook's Arctic dash in midwinter and his success in reaching the long-sought-for geographical North Pole. Five times this dauntless American has gone out on the Arctic quest: first, with Peary in 1891-92; then with the Zeta, in 1893; next with the Miranda, in 1894; again with the Belgian expedition, in 1897-99, and eight years ago on the Erik, which was attached to Peary's expedition, in 1901. He is therefore to be regarded as a veteran in Arctic search, and his present success would appear to be due to his bold decision to choose the winter for his final dash instead of the summer, when ice-packs and huge floes make progress always perilous and often impossible. His theory, formed after years of observation, was that the new ice, congealed at a temperature of 60 degrees below zero, or even lower, would afford safer and quicker passage than when it was upheaved and broken by swelling tides and high polar winds. If the news from Lerwick, in the Shetlands, which we print elsewhere by permission of The New York Herald, should be confirmed, human intrepidity and skill have achieved one of the greatest scientific triumphs of the age and the name of Frederick Cook will go down to posterity among those of the greatest of Americans.

Although Arctic voyages of discovery were made twelve hundred years ago, the serious work of polar exploration is comparatively modern, dating from the first voyage of Davis to what he aptly termed "the Land of Desolation," in 1585. Then followed the long line of brilliant exploits by Barents, Henry Hudson, Jonas Poole, Baffin, Fox, Captain Cook, Parry, Sir John Franklin, Sir John Ross, McClintock, Hayes, Nares, De Long, Weyprecht, Melville and Greely. Some of these yielded up their lives in the bleak and forbidding quest, and the frozen seas are strewn with the bleached wrecks of many a gallant ship, and the northern snows and ice hold fast the remains of many a hardy seaman who went out with those adventurous leaders, never to return.

All honor to the heroes who faced death in the frozen North for the glory of achievement, and who battled with cold, hunger and disease in the Desolate Land, each that he might win fame for his own nation among the progressive peoples of the earth. Dr. Cook's splendid achievement is, perhaps, the finest modern illustration of the indomitable human spirit of adventure which, in every age, from Ulysses to the present, has scorned danger and death in the search for a high ideal. Man's mastery of the mountain peaks and the sea's depths, his dominion of the air, and now his conquest of the Pole, all show that the old, unconquerable spirit is in no danger of dying out in the world.

Are They Buddha's Ashes?

IF the reported discovery of the ashes of Gautama Buddha, after having been hidden from the world for nearly 2,400 years, should be confirmed, his 147,000,000 followers throughout the world will hail the event as one of the greatest in modern history. Buddha died about 482 B.C., and it is recorded that the body was cremated, the ashes divided into eight portions and placed in monumental receptacles, some being enshrined in pagodas in various parts of India. One of the most famous of the kings or emperors of northern India, named Kanishka, who is supposed to have reigned about 150 B.C., reared a vast pagoda near the present site of the city of Peshawur, and in it he placed a rudely-carved bronze casket, which contained a smaller casket of rock crystal, in which were the ashes of the great teacher. Several times the pagoda was destroyed by fire, and finally, during a great Moslem invasion, it was literally razed to the ground. Lately, while Dr. Spooner, of the Indian Archæological Department, was excavating in the ruins, the precious casket was brought to the light, with its contents untouched through all the centuries. Seals, inscriptions, etc., seemed to attest the genuineness of the remarkable find. There is still a lingering doubt in the minds of the scientists, however, for Peshawur has been notorious for the production of fraudulent antiques, and this, after all, may prove to be only a new "plant," like many others that have preceded it in the same locality.

A Word for the Teacher

THE boys and girls who were promoted when school closed for the summer feel a sense of elation at having reached another grade. They usually exchange teachers at this point, and it is a little amusing to the spectator to observe that each generation in turn confronts the new teacher with a slight feeling of apprehension. "She is sure to be cross," say the little girls. "Miss Blank was lovely. We shall never have any one like her again." The boys trouble themselves less on the subject. They go through their school life more stolidly and more sturdily than their sisters. Most boys and girls presently discover that the new teacher is thoroughly friendly, and that she means to help them all she can.

It devolves upon the parents to help the teacher by seeing that the children attend school regularly. The pupil who is on hand every morning in the twelvemonth at the opening of school, whose home work is thoroughly well done and who conforms to the rules of the school, makes rapid progress, is a credit to the teacher and receives far more from the curriculum than the one who is often tardy and is permitted to stay at home at discretion. Regular attendance upon school is not only desirable for the sake of the teacher, but is a good preparation for the tasks that will follow when children are out of the schoolroom. Complaints of the teacher by the scholar should be investigated, but not in such a way that the children arrange themselves as her antagonists. Where parents and teachers work together for the welfare of the child the best results are attained for all concerned.

The Farmer's Life

IN recent years, the labor question has become so acute in many agricultural districts that farmers, we are told, rather than face the annual difficulty of securing help, are either selling out or working their farms by proxy. This phase of agricultural life is dealt with in the report of the Country Life Commission, appointed by Mr. Roosevelt. Further, the commission seems to have been driven to the conclusion, after fair investigation, that as there is no immediate prospect of relief for the labor situation, the farmer himself must provide the remedy by a change of methods in the direction of intensive farming; i. e., getting the best possible crops from a smaller acreage. While we have not yet fully reached the age of scientific agriculture, there are so many ways in which the modern American farmer goes beyond his predecessors that a life "on the land" has become far more pleasant, profitable and healthful than in earlier days. But the ideal farm life will not be realized until it becomes a career for which men are specially trained, on the lines of the latest practical science as applied to the culture of the soil. The study of hygiene and sanitation, too, are urged by the commission, and there are timely suggestions in its report of the troubles and losses that might be avoided if the importance of sanitary conditions were better understood. A good deal of attention is given to the home and social life of the farmer and his family, and these suggestions might very profitably be adopted as a means to making things more attractive, especially to the young folks, who are apt to regard a day of ten hours' steady toil as an uninviting prospect.

This report of the Country Life Commission is full of interest to our agricultural friends, and a copy should be in every farm household. It can be procured, free, from the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL NOTES

—WHILE THE COUNTRY has a right to be gratified with the generous crops this season, aggregating $8,000,000,000, it is not pleasant to be reminded that in thirteen years the household necessities of life in American homes have advanced nearly fifty per cent. in price, and are still rising.

—THERE IS A PATRIOTISM of places as well as of country—a little patriotism, so to speak, which is often deep and very real. Oliver Wendell Holmes was a shining example of this sort of patriotism. "Were you not born in Boston, sir?" asked the professor at the breakfast table. "No? It's a pity—a pity. . . . I tell you, Boston has opened, and kept open, more turnpikes that lead straight to free thought and free speech and free deeds than any other city of live men or dead men—and I don't care how broad their streets are, nor how high their steeples!" This civic pride, or local spirit, or whatever you may call it, is a fine thing and worth cultivating.

—NATIONAL FORESTER GIFFORD A. PINCHOT has given the country a very significant warning of the projected absorption, by a certain class of capitalists whom he designates as "The Water-Power Trust," of the remaining water-powers in various parts of the United States. He rightly says that whoever dominates power dominates all industry, and the saying should pass into an aphorism. Representatives of this yet unorganized Trust—which is even now in process of formation—attend the meetings of the Irrigation Congress and look sharply after their own interests. Forester Pinchot adds that a rigid construction of the law will unfortunately operate in their favor, and he suggests that the law should be liberally interpreted so as to protect the public interests. A sharp controversy has arisen on the subject, some holding that Mr. Pinchot's views were a reflection on the methods of the Interior Department and its head, Secretary Ballinger. Whatever the outcome, the Forester has rendered a public service in directing attention to a possibility which, by and by, might become a very serious reality.

Japan's Cherry Bloom for America

THE Japanese government made an offer of three hundred cherry trees to the city of New York, which has been accepted by Mayor McClellan, and the trees will be sent immediately and placed in Central Park on their arrival. It is said that they are to come from Uyeno Park in Tokyo, one of the most beautiful parks in the world. The gift has a deeper significance than appears on the surface. The chrysanthemum is the national flower of Japan, but the people in their instinctive love of the beautiful are wild with delight at the pink cherry bloom, which is the expression of that which is most fascinating in nature. When the trees are in bloom there is a veritable fairyland. On looking up one seems to see the air filled with pink clouds, and this gift of Japan is the desire that we should share with them that which is most exquisitely beautiful in nature to the eye and heart. "More beautiful than the festival of the plum tree is the Tokyo celebration of the pink-blossoming cherry, and more attractive than the brilliant throng are the marvelous trees. From the dwarf seedling of the mountains they have developed many varieties, culminating in that which bears the pink-tinged double blossoms as large as a hundred-leafed rose, covering every branch and twig with thick rosettes." Some of the trees grow to be large, and add majesty to their beauty; most of them are small. A delicate fragrance is exhaled from these flowers. The "Cherry Bloom Sunday" of Uyeno Park is a holiday of the upper middle class. One week later, the lower classes have their outing under the famous trees. Millionaires and beggars, princes and coolies, poets and artisans during this season seem to have a community of joy at the delicious cherry bloom. It is not an uncommon thing for the newspapers to indicate that Count Ito, or some other distinguished man in the empire, has left the responsibilities of state to spend three days in enjoying the witchery of the cherry bloom. Poets write their best lines and hang them on the branches as companions of beauty. Visitors to Central Park will behold in the pink cherry bloom of the trees from Japan God's beautiful thoughts in the flowers and also the love of man for his fellow-man.

It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing. (Isa. 35 : 2.)

Temperance Tidal Wave

One-half of the counties of South Carolina were already dry up to August 17, when they had a local option contest in the remaining counties where the dispensary was in existence. In those elections fifteen counties voted dry and only six wet. It is expected that South Carolina, at the next session of its Legislature, will take its place with North Carolina as a prohibition State.

The drastic temperance legislation just passed by the Alabama Legislature killed the far-famed club life of the State. All the locker systems of the clubs, as well as the country clubs, golf and gun clubs, are dry as a desert. The Fuller Bill, one of the most rigid temperance measures ever offered to a Legislature, became a law. The bill makes it impossible for clubs to dispense liquors legally under any device that has yet been invented. Besides, there are these provisions: that any person hurt by an intoxicated man may recover damages from the person who sold or gave him the liquor; that no property can be rented save on the agreement that liquors are not to be sold in it; that no corporation can bring liquors into the State without losing its charter; that no man can drink if he be a train attaché of any kind; that storage of liquors is prima facie evidence of intent to break the law; and that an internal revenue license is also evidence sufficient for conviction. It also provides that any place under suspicion may be raided, and liquors found there destroyed; that cars containing liquors may not be stored on side-tracks in the State. Those breaking any of the provisions of this law are subject to a heavy fine and imprisonment with hard labor.

In the recent local option contest in Idaho the only three counties that have voted have gone dry. There is scarcely a State in the Union that is not steadily expelling the saloon from some town or county. The conflict against the American saloon is divinely ordained and maintained, and the soldiers of the cross are loyal and brave and victorious in the conflict.

Who will rise up for me against the evildoers? Or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity? (Ps. 94 :16.)

Good Citizenship

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and his wife, who is a daughter of Senator Aldrich, hastened from their summer home in Maine to their home in Pocantico Hills to engage actively in a contest over the election of the school trustee for their district. It would have been easier for him to have remained in his place of seclusion and vacation and not disturbed himself about the conflict going on in his neighborhood, and to have saved his energy for criticism and abuse if there had been a mistake in the election; but he rather preferred to use his influence as a voter and landowner for the improvement of the schools in his neighborhood. The Rockefellers have given tens of millions of dollars for general education in the country, and this action of young Mr. Rockefeller indicates how deep-seated is his desire for the education of the young. His work is a good object lesson to the average man, rich or poor, encouraging active participation in the local political questions of the day. Good people are liable to neglect the primaries and polls, and then break out into loud wails at the corruption of politics which might have been purified by their practical discharge of duty. The State is a divine institution as well as the home and the church; without its purification it would be difficult to have happy homes or a prosperous church. It is the duty of a Christian man to meet his obligations to the State, not forgetting his vows to God. The Saviour taught this principle when the theological students undertook to entrap him, when he said:

Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's. (Matt. 22 :21.)

Insanity from Mouldy Corn

By a telegram it has been announced that over one hundred and fifty cases of pellagra have been found in the general hospital for the insane at South Bartonville, Ill. For a month Captain E. F. Siler, of the United States Army Medical Corps, has been investigating the epidemic. So far as the analysis has gone, it is believed that the disease has been caused by eating mouldy corn, and corn has been forbidden at the hospital. It is not known whether there is any cure for the disease or not. In some cases it resembles the first stages of leprosy. Photographs of twenty-four patients have been made and will be submitted to the government with Captain Siler's report. Corn, which in its healthy condition should be the staff of life, in becoming diseased by dampness has been turned to a poison to attack life. There are many things in life that are intended to be blessings, but are misused and perverted so that they become a damage and curse. It would seem that there are enough old diseases to take people away without encountering new ones. and yet the science of to-day which is having such splendid mastery over the great diseases that used to decimate the race will no doubt find some remedy for this new shocking pestilence, which is distressing some other parts of the country as well as this district of Illinois. The diseases that attack the body are only types of the various kinds of maladies which afflict the soul. Fortunately for the race, a Physician has appeared with a remedy which, if employed, will effect a cure in every instance. His healing of the body was accompanied by a cure for the soul.

And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. (Matt. 8 : 3.)

To Earn a Living

With the theory that purely academic studies in the grammar schools have outlived their usefulness in this commercial age, Professor William H. Elson, Superintendent of Schools in Cleveland, will introduce this fall one of the most radical revolutions in school curriculum ever attempted. While the academic studies will not be wholly side-tracked, the whole trend of teaching willl be along industrial lines, with the idea of teaching the child the things that will mean bread and butter to him. The change will take place in the fourth or fifth year of schooling; the time devoted to academic studies in the earlier years will, in this year and the other three or four years, be cut more than half, the time so saved being utilized in teaching the child the rudiments of trades and crafts. For the boys, shops will be installed with all necessary machinery and in charge of competent instructors. They will be drilled in the intricacies of the different trades, both through books and by working in the shops. The girls will be tutored in household duties, part of each day's work being devoted to teaching them how to sew, cook, sweep, dust, and arrange a home in an artistic manner.

The nation will look with deep interest upon the experiment in Cleveland. While some schools and colleges have not had their eyes fastened steadily enough upon the great question of the self-sustenance of the scholar, the many technical institutions of our time are laying great emphasis upon the relation of education to the earning of a living. To almost every one the bread and butter question is the first and all important one, and there cannot be much of character or successful endeavor without its having been cared for. The law of labor is so exacting that the schools must adjust themselves to give the proper amount of theoretical and practical education.

In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread. (Gen. 3:19.)

Threefold Restitution Required

The Russian courts have disclosed a new mode of treating genuine cases of kleptomania. The leading storekeepers of St. Petersburg had been missing valuable articles, and detectives traced them to a hotel whither they had been taken by Mme. Krestetz, who proved to have family property worth $250,000. Among the woman's papers was a certificate declaring that she was subject to fits of kleptomania. The case was accepted as genuine, and the court ordered the woman to pay three times the price of the goods she had taken. The storekeepers each got twice the price of the things they lost and the remainder goes to the Municipal Orphanage. If this heroic type of restitution were to be required in our country, the number of kleptomaniacs, we imagine, would be greatly reduced, and if restitution were more often required by our laws in ordinary thefts it is likely that the number of thieves would be lessened. Zaccheus felt the need of such restitution when he entered upon a new life.

If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation I restore him fourfold. (Luke 19 : 8.)

AS SUMMER WANES AT MONT-LAWN

Senator Gledhill

AMONG the many blessings which have been showered upon the Children's Home during the season of 1909, none have been more appreciated by workers and children than the interest shown by those who have visited this beautiful holiday home. Every Saturday and Sunday has seen a gathering not only of the townspeople, but of many who have traveled long distances to visit beautiful Mont-Lawn, and many have felt moved to speak to the children when they have gathered in the Temple for the service of prayer and praise. It is a question which have been the more interested, the people upon the platform or those standing in and around the building, listening with moist eyes to the wonderful singing of the little ones, or the children themselves, as speaker after speaker has addressed them from the desk.

The singing of the children is truly wonderful. They have only a few days in which to learn the songs, as their number is decreased every Monday, Wednesday and Friday, only to be increased on the evenings of the same days. Seventy-five or more children are taken down to New York on the mornings of those days, the care-takers returning in the afternoon with a like number to take their places. There must be an inspiration within the walls of the beautiful Children's Temple as well as in the training the little ones receive from those who have the music in charge. With one or two rehearsals, the children render such "part songs" as the "Glory Song," "Mont-Lawn Bells" and "Can We See the Flowers Grow?" in a manner to astonish men and women who have made music and its teaching a life-work.

Recently a man (a musician himself) who had been a close friend and neighbor of the late Ira D. Sankey said, while his voice was choked with emotion, "Oh, how I wish Sankey could hear this! No grown-up singers I ever heard could render the 'Glory Song' as these children sing it." So the children, we feel sure, impart as much pleasure as they receive in the Temple exercises, and that is the highest praise which can be awarded those who speak.

Many and varied are the subjects dwelt upon by those who stand looking into the three hundred and more little eager faces, whose sparkling eyes are only equaled by shining locks, clean faces and smiling lips. As the little ones file into the Temple each one is handed a small edition of the Stars and Stripes and a clean white handkerchief. These are quickly concealed, as the children have been previously instructed that half the fun consists in surprising those on the platform, who little dream, as the children file down the aisle, that a flag is held behind each back and that each tiny hand holds a white 'kerchief. At the words "Then hurrah for the flag," the opening line of the chorus of the "Flag Song," over three hundred flags are waved in time to the spirited tune. And when, a little later, Dr. Klopsch asks for three cheers for the speaker about to address the children, a perfect sea of fluttering handkerchiefs reminds one of a flock of snow-white doves about to alight, as they circle above the children's heads.

Among the speakers who have addressed the children are found the names of many who are well-known in the world of orators, writers and those whose lives are consecrated to the Master's work in home and foreign fields. Early in the season addresses were given by Admiral Sigsbee, who is a great favorite at Mont-Lawn; the Rev. Dr. George, who has since passed away; Rev. Mr. Mead, and many others with the same prefix to their names, have spoken to the children, to their great delight. Dr. John Wesley Hill, pastor of the Metropolitan Temple, New York, gave a talk; also Dr. Leo, from Porto Rico, told the children about the little ones of that far-off land. Dr. Leander T. Chamberlain, president of the Evangelical Alliance, who made one of the most remarkable addresses ever delivered at the Home and one which the children will long remember. Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, who has long been a frequent visitor, also spoke briefly, his genial face all aglow as he faced hundreds of tiny listeners. Harry Steele Morrison, author of How I Worked My Way Around the World, told the children how he accomplished this feat when he was a boy. Dr. H. Allen Tupper, author of Around the World With Eyes Wide Open, spoke most earnestly and interestingly on "Character Building." He was followed on the same occasion by Rev. E. L. Fox, pastor of the "People's Home Church," in East Eleventh Street, New York.

Dr. E. F. Frease, who was stationed in India for twenty-one years and who had charge of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Famine orphan work for seven years, gave a very forceful talk to the children, as also did Dr. Madison C. Peters. Hon. Reuben L. Gledhill, State Senator of the Fourth District, New York, who is an enthusiastic Sunday School man, gave one of the most interesting talks of the season. He won the hearts of the boys of Mont-Lawn before he had spoken ten words. He told them how young he was when he was put to work in a factory; there was no Mont-Lawn for him. Then, pulling out his watch, he began a most diverting discourse, beginning with the word "watch," then taking up in turn each letter: Watch your W—words. Watch your A—actions. Watch your T—tongues. Watch your C—companions. Watch your H—hearts." The children listened intently, and when the Senator's speech was ended gave him three rousing cheers and the "Chautauqua Salute."

As the season wanes, what joy must come to the hearts of those who have helped to make the summer of 1909 a happy one for the three thousand tenement children who, but for this beautiful charity, would be suffering in the hot, crowded city!

THE SECOND ESPERANTO CONGRESS

By EDWIN C. REED, F.B.E.A.,

Secretary Esperanto Association of North America.

THE Second Congress of North American Esperantists, held in Chautauqua, N. Y., August 8 to 14, 1909, was the most successful gathering yet held on this side of the world for promoting international peace and brotherhood by means of a common auxiliary language. The work accomplished, the firm and solid organization perfected, the thorough demonstration that Esperanto is practical, that addresses, sermons and songs rendered in the new language could readily be comprehended, all contributed to make the meeting a memorable one.

On Sunday, Rev. S. H. Day, resident pastor at Chautauqua, conducted the service in the international language, using the Esperanto edition of the Chautauqua vesper service, so kindly furnished by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Monday, August 9, was the first day of the Congress. At 11 A.M. the session was opened in the large amphitheatre with an address of welcome from the Chautauqua Institution, to which Mr. Benedict Papot, of Chicago, responded on behalf of the Esperanto Association of North America. At two o'clock the large Esperanto flag was raised over Chautauqua. At three o'clock the members of the Congress listened to addresses by Colonel John Pollen, LL.D., president of the British Esperanto Association; Mr. V. C. Dibble, Jr., officially representing the State Superintendent of Education of South Carolina; Professor W. J. Spillman, United States Department of Agriculture, and Mr. Lisle Terwilliger, who was present for the purpose of reporting to the Postmaster-General.

In addition to these addresses, letters were read from a large number of institutions, expressing sympathy and interest in the movement. Among these were Cornell University, Leland Stanford, Jr., University, Tufts College, Alfred University, Wellesley College, George Washington University, the State Superintendents of Education of Florida, Colorado, New Jersey, Arkansas and Utah, the Department of Public Instruction of Quebec, and several Chambers of Commerce.

The greater part of the week was devoted to business, to committee meetings and the consideration of ways and means for spreading the knowledge of Esperanto. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings entertainments wholly in Esperanto were provided by members of the Congress, and on Wednesday all went out on Lake Chautauqua.

Dr. Pollen, the president of the British samideanoj, won many friends in the Conference, and every member felt the highest esteem and personal affection for him. His propaganda speech on Tuesday was able and instructive and was cordially endorsed by all.

It was voted to hold the Sixth International Esperanto Congress in Washington, D. C. It will be under the joint direction of the Esperanto Association and the Washington Chamber of Commerce.

IN QUIET SEPTEMBER DAYS

Beginning Again

SEPTEMBER strikes the bell for a new beginning. August is largely the holiday month in many departments of labor. In the cities some of the churches have been closed, while several congregations have combined in their services, so that church privileges have not been abridged. Although this method is criticised by people who are ready to comment adversely on whatever is done by a church, a glance at the situation shows that it is wiser and better that a single edifice should be crowded to the doors than that a half dozen should be open to accommodate a sprinkling of worshipers. The enthusiasm felt when the church is full exceeds that possible when there is a great array of empty pews. Large numbers of church-going folk leave the town in August, and they ought to carry with them to rural parishes an amount of practical helpfulness which would encourage and strengthen ministers and people in the country. In both city and country the return of autumn signalizes a new start. The Sunday Schools again enlist the children; the pastors, having thrown off weariness and its consequent depression, come with a message full of cheer. The Christian Endeavor Societies rally their members, and earnest workers among the women meet and plan for another campaign.

There is zest in beginning. Now and then we grow tired as the day wears on. Sometimes the evening hour finds us exhausted, but the morning is the period for ardor and initiative. Shall we think of September as though it were the morning in our church work? Where shall we personally commence to do what we can to lift the church we attend to a higher plane? . . .

If a church is apathetic the apathy can be dissipated and replaced by ambition and energy only as, one by one, each individual does his best. The mass cannot be lifted in any other way. The burden of inertia that weighs heavily on this and the other church can be lessened and finally removed when every one, from the oldest to the youngest, is concerned about lifting a little. Of all stupid things the most utterly futile is to throw the entire blame on the minister when a church does not prosper. The minister is only one. He is the leader, but if his followers are not loyal his leadership is of small avail.

In beginning again, for most of us the reform might be started in attendance on the midweek meeting. Every one can help here. Merely to be present in one's place at the prayer meeting is to testify that one believes in united prayer. The evening itself should be kept open and free from social engagements. If the church members in a community resolve that they will not attend other meetings on the night for prayer they will vastly assist the church and increase its usefulness.

Suppose we begin as we intend to go on. If hitherto we have been unsociable, let us be friendly. Let us start by welcoming strangers and making no distinction between the rich and the poor. Caste has no right to intrude upon church life. Particularly let us look out for the young. The hope of the church, as of the world, is in its young men and young women. Let us gather the children into the morning assembly as well as into the Sunday School.

THE ACADEMY BELL

THE rich air is sweet with the breath of September,
The sumach is staining the hedges with red;
Soft rests on the hill-slopes the light we remember,
The glory of days which so long ago fled,
When, brown-cheeked and ruddy,
Blithe-hearted and free,
The summons to study
We answered with glee.
Listen, oh! listen, once more to the swell
Of the masterful, merry Academy bell!

It sounds not in vain over mountain and valley,
That teesin which gathers the far-scattered clans;
From play-time and leisure, fleet-footed they rally,
Brave lads and bright lasses, o'erflowing with plans;
From croquet and cricket
To blackboard and map
Is but shooting a wicket;
No fear of mishap.
Oh, hark! how it echoes through dingle and dell,
The jocund, the earnest Academy bell!

The path by the river, where willows are drooping,
Is radiant with children. The long city street,
All busy with traffic, makes room for their trooping,
And rings to the rush of their beautiful feet.
For the poet and preacher,
The man of affairs,
And the gentle home-teacher,
O'erburdened with cares,
Alike spare a moment to wishing them well,
Who speed when they hear the Academy bell.

God bless them, our darlings! God give them full measure
Of joy at the fountain of wisdom and truth;
We tenderly view the enchantment of pleasure
Which royally lies on the days of their youth;
For, brown-cheeked and ruddy,
When children at home,
That summons to study
Once called us to come;
And voices departed we hear in the swell
Of the never-forgotten Academy bell.

THE BROOKSIDE MEADOW

"Peace
Pipes on her pastoral hillock a languid note,'
And watches her harvest ripen, her herd increase."
—From "The Brook," by Tennyson.

The Mending Basket

EVERY boy and every man should know how, in an emergency, to sew on a button or set in a patch. A very good present for a young man is a supply of needles and thread, scissors and buttons and the little appliances that form a mending outfit. There is no reason why a boy should not be able to darn a stocking, mend a rip in a glove and put on a missing button, when he finds it no trouble to replace the cover on his rubber ball, on the whole a rather nice piece of business, requiring a good deal of skill. Mothers and sisters do not complain that they have the monopoly of the mending basket, and that the weekly task of the family mending occupies a good many afternoon and evening hours. Sewing and mending are women's work, to be sure, but equally they are within the compass of masculine intelligence. Men do finer work than women in certain lines, as, for instance, in tailoring and watchmaking. When a woman has finished her morning's work, prepared dinner and cleared it away, entertained the baby and looked after the little folk who must be mittened and rubbered before they go out to play in the snow, when at last she sits down by the fire fancying that she has secured a half hour of rest in which she may linger over her CHRISTIAN HERALD and enjoy a bit of quiet thought, it is to the last degree provoking and unnecessary that her fifteen-year-old son should rush in upon her with a demand that she shall mend his gloves on the instant or repair a worn place in his sweater. Why should he not do it himself?

Man works from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done.

It never will be until men begin to accept as their share some bits of the trivial round that have by tacit consent been thrown into the laps of women. One of the manliest boys in a certain circle, a lad who can hold his own in study or play with the best, boasts that he can help his mother anywhere, from slicing the bacon in the morning and browning the pancake to making a good cup of coffee and a perfect slice of toast, and to darning stockings, as well as she can herself. Mothers are much in fault in letting their boys imagine that household tasks of any sort are beneath their attention. Soldiers and sailors learn how to take care of themselves, and do it very well.

A hint may be in order about not letting the ordinary mending get beyond you. So soon as the clothes come up from the wash, the wise housekeeper looks them over carefully and lays aside those that need repair. A thin place in a tablecloth, the torn end of a sheet, the little rent in a garment, should be attended to before the articles are laid away in bureau drawers or the linen closet. If each person in a family, except the man of the house, is trained in the art of the stitch in time, the mending basket will not be so formidable. Husbands and fathers, if they do their proper share in the support of the household, should not be called upon to look after their own sewing. The mending basket would seldom overflow to the dismay of a matron if it were thoroughly emptied week by week. If clothing is given away in charity, it should be a point of honor to repair it before it leaves the donor's hands.

Evangelistic Missions*

THE prayer of Nehemiah that the Lord's pledge to Moses might be redeemed in his day was partially answered. The similar prayer which has gone up from all Christendom, that the peoples of all lands might be gathered under the banner of the Lord, seems to be also on the way to fulfilment. The reports from returning missionaries and the letters from the foreign field, all indicate that greater strides than ever before are being made in the Christianization of the world.

One of the most hopeful signs in this direction is, perhaps, seldom counted as such. It is the tendency everywhere seen to abolish sectarianism—to drop minor features of creed and doctrine—and to unite on the broad platform of the love of Christ and the hatred of sin. Until the evangelical sects join forces in this way, the conversion of the world must be needlessly delayed.

The most rapid progress seems to be made in those foreign fields in which great stress is laid upon the preparation of native workers. This implies schools and teachers; the long and patient weeding out of deep-seated race superstitions; and a thorough knowledge of Christian home-making. All these are expensive and of slow growth. A great jurist has said that a nation cannot be civilized by process of law. No more can the foreign missionary find any quick and patent way for converting his heathen. Line upon line, precept upon precept, year in and year out; and different ways for different peoples—the missionary to the Jews becoming a Jew, to the weak becoming weak—all things to all men, if by chance he may save some.

The condition of the Nestorians when Fidelia Fiske went to them as a ministering angel, is substantially the condition of the greater part of the heathen world to-day. The houses were mere huts, filthy and disgusting. Their language had no word for home. The condition of women was utterly degraded. Mothers wept when daughters were born to them. Many mothers died, with their infant children, among the cattle. It was deemed dishonorable to inquire after the health of a wife, nor might she speak to her husband before his parents, though all usually lived in the same room. Women were not reckoned in counting up a family. In 1835, only one Nestorian woman in Syria could read.

Everything in Miss Fiske's school had to be kept under lock and key. No pupil's word could be depended upon. Impurity was the rule. Miss Fiske was in despair. No matter how carefully she instructed her pupils, they would go home to vice and filth, and she felt that her teaching was undone almost before it was done.

All missionaries have had trouble, in beginning their work in a new field, to find good text-books in the native languages. Many who have gone forth with the burning desire to preach the Gospel to the heathen have found that they could do little until grammars and spelling-books were provided; and they have had to spend years in the prosaic task of making such text-books before they could expound the Bible to a comprehending people.

If you become a missionary, stand ready to do anything. You may have to do carpentry or metal work, like Cyrus Hamlin; you may have to translate books, like William Morrison; you may have to teach cooking and housekeeping, or perform medical or dental operations. Be ready to do any good work which may gain the favor of the people, and thus open the way for Christ's truth to enter their souls.

Faith Paralyzed by Fear*

FEAR is the most groveling of emotions. So long as fear dominates man, no progress is possible in any direction. While armed bands of ruffians were constantly patrolling the woods and fields, ready to seize all that they could lay hands on, education, art, science and religion languished, as in the Middle Ages. Law and order had to come in and deliver men from the perpetual fear in which they lived, before any substantial advance could be made in the higher life.

The great foundation upon which we are working out, day by day, the destiny of our republic is, in the last analysis, the absence of fear. If the strong hand of the law should be removed for a single day, and the degraded element among us should have its way unchecked, imagine the fear that would hold sway and the way in which all work would cease.

The very words "the reign of terror" summon to our minds a picture so frightful that the imagination recoils before it. Whenever a similar season is predicted, a universal shudder runs through all human society.

A child unaccustomed to brass bands once heard one noisily approaching, and ran to hide herself.

"What are you afraid of?" her mother asked her. "The music won't hurt you."

"No-o," the child said doubtfully, "but I'm afraid I shall be afraid."

All of us are afraid that we shall be afraid, and we guard by every means in our power the safety of the individual and the State.

Thus great nations account for the criminally expensive armaments which they are providing. As one of our newspaper poets has recently said in verse, they spend upon the firing of a single gun the price of hundreds of barrels of flour. A single Dreadnought costs enough to equip a great university or a hospital of mercy. And there is no reason for this wicked expense except that these nations are "afraid."

One of the prime virtues of the Christian religion is that it kills fear. We are but human, and, like Peter, we often feel our faith wavering; but if we will but read the words of our Lord over and over until faith grows strong in our souls, and love blooms there, all fear will be cast out.

It has been a source of fear to a certain class among us that so many have risen up to question our religion and pry into the elements of our sacred beliefs. But let us not be fearful. As Bishop Williams eloquently says, we show thereby that we are "instinctively uncertain of the grounds upon which our faith rests. Such faith betrays its lack of confidence by its very temper of anxiety and consternation whenever any one presumes to question it. We welcome," he continues, "the most drastic criticism which shall reveal to us defects in the Church. Christianity is to be judged by its fruits. A few real saints are a better answer to the agnostic's question than many books on theology."

In one of James Russell Lowell's letters he says something like this: "God must know that the framework of his universe is fireproof, or else he would not leave the matches lying around so carelessly." We need not worry.

The "fearful" are classed in the Revelation (21:8) with the "unbelieving, and the abominable, murderers, idolaters and liars."

It is wicked to live in a state of fear. God knows and God governs. Let us do our duty day by day, and leave the rest confidently to him.

"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

Angels of Mercy

O H this beautiful world which we see—
This beautiful, beautiful world!
With its treasures, how glad we should be—
How glad, with love's banner unfurled.
With the pleasures that wealth can impart,
Peace and joy should abide in the heart.

But, alas for the frailty of men!
Wealth often proves only a snare!
When our coffers are full, it is then
Of selfishness we should beware.
Sinful greed often grows with our gains,
Noble impulses languish in chains!

Then beware of the foe that assails;
The foe to our peace and our joy.
When the love of the Father prevails,
Base selfishness cannot destroy.
With His love, we succeed in a trice;
Let us seek for this "pearl of great price."

Flee away, selfish greed! flee away!
Give place to the angel of peace.
For a generous heart we will pray,
That graces may ever increase.
Far around, and to zenith above,
May we hear a grand chorus of love.

To the sad and despondent give cheer,
And aid those in need, as we can;
For the Father above holds them dear—
The child, and the destitute man.
As God's angels of mercy, to bless,
Let us hasten to those in distress.

Passaic, N. J. JOHN M. MORSE.

The Password

I HAVE joined all your clubs and your lodges,
Have memorized passwords and signs,
And used them to pull through tight places
When luck seemed to run in hard lines;
And I've known what it is to be humble
And toil up the narrow defile;
But I notice I pass by unchallenged
When my bright face is framing a smile.

Some days when I looked wry and sombre,
Life seemed an imbittering task,
And I fancied the whole world against me,
For my soul was obscured by a mask;
I knew why the people dodged by me
And rushed to get out of my sight,
For men love to bask in the sunshine,
But flee the dark face of the night.

The thoughts that are nearest and dearest
Are those that are happy and bright,
For the soul bids the memory waken
The scenes that are bathed in sunlight;
And the face of a dear one comes to me
With smile so serene, bright and gay,
That it scatters a joy and a blessing
As if angels were passing that way.

Then I know that the Master who made us
Believes in a Gospel of cheer,
And beams from his throne on the pilgrim
Who wipes from his brother a tear;
And when the last trumpet is sounded
I'll note as I near the Blest Isles
The faces that greet me up yonder
Are crowned with a halo of smiles.

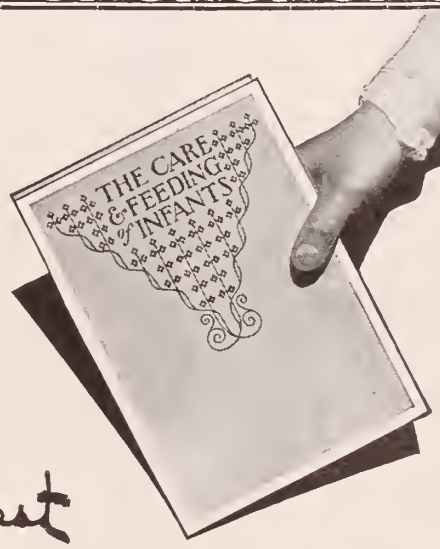
This book will be sent free to any mother on request



We hope that you will send for a copy of "The Care and Feeding of Infants" because we know the information it contains will be invaluable to you. There are times when you do not know just what to do for your baby; if you have this little book at hand it will help you solve the difficult questions that so often arise.

This book is full of simple and helpful suggestions; suggestions about baby's bath; his clothes and exercise; the care of the nursing bottles and nipples; and many other details equally important to the baby's welfare.

Especially valuable are the chapters regarding the baby's food; what kind of milk should be used; how it should be modified with Mellin's Food to suit varying needs; how often the baby should be fed; etc.

Whether you are nursing your baby or not, success depends upon perfectly understanding his needs. You will be better able to care for his wants and to safeguard him against sickness if you have this book to consult.

With the book we will send you a generous Sample Bottle of Mellin's Food for trial use. There is no better method of modifying fresh milk for a baby than by using Mellin's Food.

Simply cut out, sign, and mail the coupon to us, and the book and Sample Bottle will be sent to you free by return mail.

Working For Temperance*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

BEFORE we start on the study of the lesson it would be well to give a brief commentary in explanation of phrases: "All things are lawful." There was a dispute between the Jewish and the Greek members of the Corinthian Church. The Greeks saw no harm in eating meat that had been offered to idols, since to them idol meat had lost its sacredness. The Jewish members, however, resting on the law which they had received through Moses, could think of it only as sin to eat meat that had been offered to idols, or that had not been killed in the prescribed manner. Both parties appealed to Paul as an arbitrator. He wrote them a letter, in which he showed there was something higher than "lawful," even consideration for the good of others.

It was clearly unlawful for the Jews to eat meat that had been offered to idols. But it was always Paul's claim that Greeks did not need to become as Jews in becoming Christians. And so, while in a way it might be considered lawful for Greeks to eat meat that had been offered to idols, it was not "expedient" for them to do it, lest they should be misunderstood and lead others astray.

"Asking no questions for conscience sake." Paul would have the Corinthians understand that they might safely eat of whatever was sold in the market, and need not scrupulously inquire from whence it came; and that if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him. (Dr. Schaff.)

"This hath been offered in sacrifice." Very different would be the case if the host should tell his guest that the meat had been placed before idols; "then eat not," was Paul's unhesitating decree.

"Conscience, not thine own, but the other's." While it might still not be wrong for the Christian to eat idol meat, because it had lost its sacredness, the idol worshiper would be unable to make the distinction, and so Paul's advice was, "Give no occasion of stumbling."

"Do all to the glory of God." God's name is glorified when we act according to the best good of others, instead of for our own interest alone.

"Please all men in all things." Not as a sychophant surely, but as one contributing one's possessions to the general well-being.

A Practical Question of To-day

It is not, shall we abstain from the use of meat offered to idols, lest we cause our brother to offend? but it is, shall we not in his interest, as well as our own, abstain from intoxicating drinks? There can be no question about our duty. Even should low license or high license prevail in the town or city where we dwell, it would still be unlawful for us to use such drinks, because it would be against the law of God to do anything that would cause our neighbor to offend. The United States Supreme Court has rendered a decision that "there is no inherent right of a citizen to sell intoxicating liquor by retail. It is not a privilege of the citizen of the State, or a citizen of the United States." The saloon is therefore an outlaw, and an outrage.

A recent invention is an instrument for measuring deflection on loaded bridges and other structures. It is said "the single fact that the deflection of a bridge is generally regarded as the factor which decides the length of its life" shows the value of an instrument of this character. It works by means of an amplifying lever, movable around a horizontal axis, together with a stirrup, a rod and a steel wire; deflections are recorded on a cylinder by a special pen, the cylinder being moved by clock work. In this way the disintegration of a bridge or a building may be discovered in time to save it.

The warnings of friends, the weakness the drinking man feels in the bodily ills which come to him, should be like a bridge telltale to him. But usually he will heed none of these things, but rush on to destruction.

At the start, saloons made the pretense of being a means to provide cheery places for those who had desolate, unhappy homes, or had no homes at all. We often hear the saloon spoken of as "the poor man's club." But in reality the saloon is an incarnate evil, which preys upon all who enter there. It preys even upon the young child, too small to see the top of the counter, sent by parents to get the family liquor. The bottle is passed to the child with one hand, and the cork with the other, a way they have of giving an invitation to sip; and they fill the pitcher which the child brings so full that the child feels obliged to drink some, in order to keep from spilling it.

Let us place over the door of the saloon an inscription which Dante writes over the gate of hell:

Through me ye enter the abode of woe,
Through me to endless sorrow are ye brought;
Through me amid the souls accurst ye go;
All hope abandon, ye who enter here.

Robert Burdette has said: "Search through the history of this hateful thing—the saloon—and read one page

EASY FOOD

Ready For Instant Use Without Cooking

Almost everyone likes a cereal food of some kind at breakfast and supper, but the ordinary way of cooking cereals results in a pasty mass that is hard to digest, and if not properly digested, the raw mass goes down into the intestinal tract where gas is generated and trouble follows.

Everyone knows that good food properly digested keeps the body well, while poor food, or even food of good quality that is poorly prepared and not digested, is sure to bring on some kind of disease.

The easiest food to digest in this line is Grape-Nuts, made from wheat and barley, and cooked thoroughly at the factory, some 12 to 16 hours being consumed in the different processes of preparation. The food, therefore, is ready for instant service and the starch has been changed to a form of sugar, so that it is pre-digested and ready for almost immediate absorption.

A Chicago young lady writes that she suffered for years from indigestion and dyspepsia from the use of food that was not suitable to her powers of digestion. She says:

"I began using Grape-Nuts, and I confess to having had a prejudice at first, and was repeatedly urged before I finally decided to try the food, but I have not known what indigestion is since using it, and have never been stronger or in better health. I have increased in weight from 109 to 124 pounds."

People can be well, practically without cost, if they will adopt scientific food and leave off the indigestible sort.

"There's a Reason."

Grape-Nuts food is crisp and delicious to the taste. It should be served exactly as it comes from the package, without cooking, except in cases where it is made up into puddings and other desserts.—Book of delicious receipts, and "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

over which some mother can bow her grateful head and thank God for all the saloon did for her boy. There is no such record. All its history is written in tears and blood, with smears of shame and stains of crime, and dark blots of disgrace."

Playing Saloon

"I hear that Smith has sold out his saloon," said one of a couple of middle-aged men who sat sipping at their beer and eating a bit of cheese in a Smithfield Street saloon the other night.

"Yes," responded the other, rather slowly.

"What was the reason? I thought he was just coining money there."

The other nibbled a cracker abstractedly for a moment, and then said: "It's rather a funny story. Smith, you know, lives on Mount Washington, right near me, where he has an excellent wife, a nice home, and three as pretty children as ever played outdoors. All boys, you know, the oldest not over nine, and all about the same size.

"Well, Smith went home one afternoon last week, and found his wife out shopping, or something of that sort. He went on through the house into the back yard; and there, under an apple tree, were the little fellows playing. They had a bench and some bottles and tumblers, and were playing 'keep saloon.' He noticed they were drinking something out of a pail, and they acted tipsy. The youngster who was behind the bar had a towel tied around his waist, and was setting up drinks pretty free. Smith walked over and looked in the pail. It was beer, and two of the boys were so drunk that they staggered. A neighbor's boy, a couple of years older, lay asleep behind the tree.

"'Hold on, boys, you must not drink that,' he said, as he lifted the six-year-old from behind the bench.

"'We's playing s'loon, papa, an' I was a sellin' it just like you,' said the little fellow. Smith poured out the beer, carried the drunken boy home, and then took his own boys in and put them to bed. When his wife came back she found him crying like a child. He came back down town that night and sold out his business, and says he will never sell or drink another drop of liquor. His wife told mine about it, and she broke down crying while she told it."

This is a true story, but the name was not "Smith."

Quarterly Temperance Lessons

Four times a year specific temperance teaching is given to the children in all the world, through the International Sunday School Lessons. It must be acknowledged that this is done more thoroughly in some lands than in others. It cannot be done too thoroughly in the United States. Sunday School teachers should seize the opportunity to teach the direful results of intemperance and to do their part in a campaign of education in order to stay and reduce the terrible waste of mind, body and estate. It is often stated that the temperance lessons are not popular in the Sunday School. Temperance can certainly be made an interesting, if not a pleasing, subject if it is taught in up-to-date relations. Mrs. Zillah Foster Stevens, secretary of the Temperance Committee of the International Sunday School Association, is sending out a card, which has on it this suggestion:

> The year's lessons have been Missionary —seed-sowing lessons—showing the first Christian Missionaries sowing the Word of God in the first century. Make this quarterly temperance lesson a
> TEMPERANCE-MISSIONARY LESSON.
> Show how the "good seed" planted by the missionaries of this twentieth century is mixed with, and choked by, the Weed of Intemperance—the Drink Habit and Liquor Traffic brought into missionary fields from Christian lands. Line of thought:
> 1. "THE FIELD IS THE WORLD." (Use Missionary Maps.)
> 2. THE "GOOD SEED" IS THE "WORD OF GOD."
> 3. THE WORD OF GOD GREW.

One Sunday School teacher has written to us that she wishes to represent, with ribbons of different colors and lengths, the several amounts spent in the United States during a year for foreign missions, furniture, public education, boots and shoes, bread, tobacco and intoxicating liquors. This is practical and effective. We referred her to page 174 of the World Temperance Book. It is a fact that more than twice as much money is spent for intoxicating liquors than is spent for bread, and ten times as much as for public school education! What wonder that crime is on the increase in the United States! What wonder that for the last two quarters we have been urging a temperance educational campaign, which contemplates following each quarterly temperance lesson in the Sunday School with a temperance education week, when the moral leaders in the community shall see to it that there is a general distribution of temperance leaflets, giving recent discoveries in Germany concerning alcohol, as wonderful and as capable of life-saving service as wireless telegraphy.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXXIV

A Terrible Dilemma

VARIOUS matters kept Marco Covino in New York for some days after the Fourth. It was not until the eighth, indeed, that he finally turned his face toward the Prestons' Long Island home.

To Marco these days had been momentous ones, for during their course he had made a discovery—he had fallen in love. In no other way could he account for his restlessness at the enforced delay, and for his eagerness to return to the companionship of a certain fair-haired girl, with blue-violet eyes. As he looked ahead life seemed very sweet to him, if to share it with him there were to be this girl. He shuddered and closed his eyes, as he pictured the dreary waste that that same life would be to him without her.

Marco was seriously disturbed. He had not meant to marry. Somewhere in his own life, or in his father's life, there had been a mystery, else why that change of name from Bonelli to Covino? Since his return to America he had tried to question his father on the matter, once or twice; but the sick man had been so nervously excited, and so plainly averse to saying anything about his past life, that Marco had not liked to trouble him, especially when the nurse had warned him not to let the sick man overtax his strength. Then too, until now, no real need beyond his own personal interest had arisen; for nowhere, among the admiring throngs of women that he had met both at home and abroad, had he found one who had stirred his pulse by so much as an extra beat. The case was different now, however; yet how was he to tell a woman he loved her—he asked himself—when he did not know whether the name he laid at her feet was his own or not?

He had seen his father only once since the Fourth, though he had visited the hospital again just before leaving New York for Long Island. He had gone there determined to make an effort to get at the truth of the matter; but his father was asleep—his first rest for some hours. And so the son had come away with the questions still unasked.

As Marco thought of it, there seemed to be only one way out at present. He would go to Howard Preston, his best friend, for advice. Possibly he might already know something of the matter. John Covino might have confided in him during all those years while his son had been away. At all events, Marco decided that at least he ought not to speak to Florence of his love for her until he had made all possible efforts to find out where he stood.

It was a good resolution, and he meant to keep it; but he almost broke it late that afternoon, for Florence met him at the station and they had a tête-à-tête drive home in the twilight. The girl's cheeks were flushed, and her eyes glowed with soft fire. The one thing that was uppermost in her mind, however, she did not mention—the letter she had received from her friend at Mont-Lawn.

Just what they did speak of perhaps neither could have told. Florence knew only that the sunset was the most beautiful one she had ever seen, and that just to be alive to enjoy it was the most wonderful thing in the world. That there was a hidden something somewhere, however, she must have dimly understood; for she refused to meet Covino's eyes as he helped her from the carriage, and she hurried almost at once into the house.

In Preston's den that evening, after the rest of the family had gone to bed, came Marco's opportunity. The two men were smoking together, and had been talking of various matters, when Marco attempted to bring the conversation around to the subject that was so near his heart. He had planned a skilful introduction by which he hoped to lead up to the matter naturally, but at the critical point his throat seemed to contract and his head to swim; the next moment he was exasperated to hear himself stammering a banal:

"What a beautiful girl your sister is, Preston!" Certainly that was not the sort of beginning he had meant to make; but before he could speak again he was silenced by a curious something that had come into Preston's face.

"Yes, she is even more than that, my boy," he was saying quietly; "and I am rather glad you have brought the matter up. It gives me a good chance to tell you something I've wanted for some time to speak of. Florence is not my sister, you know. She is really no relation whatever."

"I know—at least, I remember your saying something of the kind, years ago, but I had forgotten it," murmured the younger man, vainly trying to rally his forces for another and a more skilful attack.

"She is, as I thought I told you, the daughter of my mother's dearest friend, and ever since she came to us, years ago, she has seemed like an own daughter to mother. I am hoping—you may have guessed—" Preston hesitated, then went on, a deeper note in his voice, "I am hoping to make her, some time, even more nearly—a daughter to my mother."

Across the room his friend caught his breath sharply and gripped the arm of his chair with tense fingers.

"You—mean—as—" Even as he spoke Marco wondered how his lips had found the strength to form the words.

"As my wife—yes," answered Howard Preston.

There was a dead silence. Then, after a time, a sternly controlled voice murmured:

"You are to be—congratulated. I did—not—know."

"No, of course you did not," returned Preston, a little sadly. "In fact, that's exactly the trouble—none of us know. You see, it is not a certainty at all—only a hope. I have not yet won her love."

Marco almost sprang to his feet. Then it was not quite too late; even yet he might win her love; even yet—he would win it! Then suddenly his eyes fell upon the bowed head of the man opposite, the man who was his friend.

"Perhaps not yet, but why should you not win it in time?" he said gently; and only to himself was the steadiness of his voice a surprise.

"Thank you," Preston said gratefully, coming out of his revery. "We'll hope for the best, my boy," he added, as Marco rose from his chair to say good night.

In his own room, a little later, Marco faced the problem that had come to him so unexpectedly, and tried to realize just what it meant.

As he tossed sleeplessly through the long night, he decided that the only thing for him to do was to go away. He certainly did not dare to trust himself to the daily sight of another man trying to win the love of the girl he had thought to win for himself; and he certainly also had no intention of placing the smallest barrier in the way of that other man's success.

As he looked at it, therefore, it was

Coffee's Weight On Old Age

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

A superintendent of public schools in North Carolina, says:

"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker and had been troubled with her heart for a number of years, and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago, I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavour of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it, that after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family liked it so well, that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches are not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

THE STORY OF MARCO

merely another case of his old boyhood's "red, white and blue"; and this time it was the part of truth and loyalty and bravery to run away—not stay. There remained, then, only the mere arrangement of details, for go he must and would.

CHAPTER XXXV

A Change of Plans

MARCO COVINO was not the only one that did not sleep on the night after his arrival at the Prestons'. In a dainty little blue-and-white bedroom in the east wing a young girl lay wide awake, hour after hour. At last, finding that sleep was not to be coaxed, she arose, threw a light garment over her shoulders and seated herself at a window where she might look out upon the starlit night.

She thought the stars might help her, they seemed so cool, and far away, and impersonal; but they proved to be altogether too far away and impersonal, while her problem was very near and human.

She had decided long ago that the love for which Howard Preston asked ought to go to him. She even thought she had planted in her heart the seed of that love, and for some time now she had been confidently looking for it to grow. But it had not grown. On the contrary, a very different plant had come up—a shy, tremulous thing, that hid from the light of day, and seemed to be rooted in nothing more substantial than a thought, a strain of music, a hand pressure, or the glance of a dark eye. For this alien flower she had planted no seed. It had come up unbidden; while as for the other—she had even watered that with her tears, yet it had refused to grow.

It was all very pitiful, very much to be deplored; and she could not understand it in the least. With a long sigh she finally rose and crept back to bed, little the wiser or the happier for her long meditation.

Morning brought a subtle change to the atmosphere of the Preston house-party. Florence, being the most sensitive, perhaps, noticed it first. It was a curious thing, elusive and indefinable. For some time after she had discovered it she could not put her finger upon it, and say, "Lo, here," or "Lo, there." She knew only that it was present, somewhere. Then, unexpectedly, on the second day she found it—young Covino was constrained, ill at ease; he had entirely lost his friendly air of comradeship, and—she was sure of this—he avoided her.

She told herself that she was glad; that it made an easy way out of her difficulties, for, of course, with nothing to feed upon, that alien flower in the garden of her heart could not grow. She found out very speedily, however, that she was mistaken; for it was upon just this sort of thing that the flower throve—disgracefully.

On the fourth day, Marco Covino went to New York—to see his father, he said; and three days later came a letter to Mrs. Preston, which proved to be something in the nature of a bombshell. Mrs. Preston read it at the breakfast table; then she gave an exclamation of disappointment.

"Children, what do you suppose is the matter? Mr. Covino is not coming back!" she cried.

"Not coming back!" exclaimed her son.

"No. He writes a very pretty letter, and thanks us heartily for all our kindness, but says that various matters have conspired to prevent his finishing his visit here, as he had at first hoped that he might."

"Oh, what a shame!" cried Madge Dana. "And he was so delightful!"

"But what is it? What's the matter?" demanded Howard.

Mrs. Preston shook her head.

"I don't know. He says 'it will be his loss,' and that he's 'very sorry.' He asks that what he didn't take with him be sent to his hotel at any time that's convenient."

"But it's so odd—it isn't like him a bit," argued Howard.

"And so unexpected," murmured Miss Dana.

"And so very disappointing all around," finished Mrs. Preston, as she tucked the letter into its envelope. And she alone noticed that of all that group at the table Florence had been the only one to make no comment. It was Mrs. Preston, too, who noted that Florence ate but little breakfast, and soon asked to be excused.

CHAPTER XXXVI

A Crisis

IN talking of it afterward, Florence and Marco agreed that if it had not happened then it would have happened at some time not much later. It was one of the kind of things that happen just because they must happen—because the natural trend of two lives leads undeviatingly toward just that crisis.

It was in November, and at the first concert that Signor Covino was giving that season. For a month the Prestons had been in their Fifth Avenue home, and Covino had called there two or three times. Other than these few times Florence had not seen him.

The concert was half over when the usher discovered the whiff of smoke curling up from the rear of the first balcony. A woman saw it then, and screamed. On the stage the young violinist was playing, with an orchestra forty strong at his back. He, too, saw the curl of smoke—but he did not stop playing.

There was more commotion now. Another woman had seen the smoke, and had screamed. All over the house men and women had risen.

From the wings a frenzied voice called to the players:

"For God's sake, don't stop! Play—play—keep 'em cool!"

And they did play, steadily, splendidly, though by this time half the vast audience was on its feet, and the whiff of smoke had become little darting flames.

Long minutes later, Covino came face to face with a girl who was plunging back through the smoking corridor.

"Florence!"

"Marco!"

And to neither of them did it seem strange that he took her in his arms and kissed her. As it chanced, they were alone in the veil of smoke; but it would have been the same had they met in Broadway at that illuminating moment. Ordinary standards were swept aside. The conventions of the social life they knew were as if burned away. Face to face in that moment of peril, they looked into each other's eyes, and saw only the supreme truth of their love.

"But, dearest, how came you alone—here?" Even as he spoke he had turned her about, and was guiding her through the stifling passageway.

"I don't know. I was with the Eatons, and I think—I lost them, someway. I looked back and saw you still playing, and I—I had to come back, that's all. I thought I could reach you this way. It was quite empty, and—I ran."

For answer he pressed her arm tenderly. To neither of them yet had it occurred that there was anything strange in this sudden intimacy, but the realization came soon—very soon. One turn more brought them to a wider corridor, and through this they quickly reached one of the exits to the street.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Hand-made Gentleman*

THOSE who pick up this book, by Irving Bacheller, will find it hard to lay down. "Cricket Heron," who is quite as much the hero as the "hand-made gentleman" himself, begins his career as a boy on the first page, and becomes, on the last, a distinguished and prosperous man. His adventures are brimming with interest and excitement. One wonders just how much of them is true. It seems as though all of them must be.

It was a happy thought of the author to weave into his quaint and whimsical narrative many historic scenes and personages. Jim Fisk, with his red wagons, and his velvet coat and boutonniere; Blondin's thrilling tight-rope walk across Niagara Falls; old Commodore Vanderbilt's horses, his kindness to his mother, his genuinely good ambitions for the future of our country; Carnegie, with his plans for improving and increasing the steel output of his mills, and his tears upon hearing of the death of Lincoln; the building of Vanderbilt's light wagon, and his fight with the Erie; the great day when it culminated, and the Erie books disappeared; the panic of Black Friday; the career of John Morrissey, and several other notable events and characters are sketched to the life in these vivid pages. Thousands of those who passed through the stirring period in which "Cricket Heron" figured, will read this story breathlessly, and will find recalled to them their own emotions when the newspapers first brought the tidings which are now a part of the great record of our nation's progress.

Like Eben Holden, The Hand-Made Gentleman abounds in meaty aphorisms. Many of these are real additions to our stock of maxims. An especially striking saying occurs near the end of the book, as a quotation from General Hampton. It is that "there would have been no war of '61 if our railroads had run north and south instead of east and west."

The book is saturated with true "Americanism." Its ideals are of the highest, and it should have a place in every library in the land.

The Hand-Made Gentleman.* By Irving Bacheller, author of Eben Holden, etc. 332 pp. Price $1.50. Harpers, New York.

Books Received

Cuba and Other Verse. By Robert Manners. Cloth binding; pp. 173. Price $1. William Briggs, Toronto, Ont., Canada, publisher.

The Imprisoned Midshipmen. By Molly Elliot Seawell, author of Paul Jones, Midshipman Paulding, etc. Illustrated. $1.25. D. Appleton & Co., New York. A sea story, told in Miss Seawell's well-known style and of especial interest to the young.

The King and His Kingdom. Constructive Studies in the Life of Christ, for Classes and for Private Use. By Robert Wells Veach. 60 cents. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. A careful, systematic arrangement of the life of Christ, with maps and many refercnces. The book has borne the test of actual use. Much Bible reading and study is ineffective because of the lack in it of purpose and order. This book provides a remedy for this defect.

Things Worth While. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. In The Art of Life Series, edited by Edward Howard Griggs. Cloth covers. Pp. 73. B. W. Huebsch, New York, publisher.

The Well in the Desert. By Adeline Knapp. This is a story dealing with the elemental and vital things of life, the scenes set on the edge of the Arizona desert. Cloth binding. Pp. 329. Price $1.50. The Century Company, New York, publishers.

The Living Word. By Dr. Elwood Worcester, of Emmanuel Church, Boston. This volume treats of Faith, God's Goodness, the Soul and Immortality, Death and the Hereafter, the Spiritual Body, etc. Pp. 351; cloth binding. Price $1.50. Moffat, Yard & Co., New York, publishers.

The Lincoln Centenary. 1909; and Other 1909 Aniversaries for the Schools of West Virginia. A Programme for Lincoln Day, and Suggestions for the Observance of the Birthdays of Other Eminent Men. Prepared by Thomas C. Miller, State Superintendent of Schools, Charleston, W. Va. Tribune Printing Company. Many States have prepared especial celebrations for the great centennary, but it seems hardly possible that any can be more complete than this. Here are several portraits of Lincoln; two facsimiles of his incomparable letters; and a fairly complete biography.

Thoughts for Life's Journey. By George Matheson, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., author of Leaves for Quiet Hours, Rests by the River, etc. $1.25. A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York. A collection of eighty-six of what the author calls "devotional sermonettes," which have appeared from time to time in the Christian World. They are eloquent and sincere, even impassioned, and upon almost all the subjects which engage the earnest Christian's thoughts. A good book to keep upon one's table and to dip into every day.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—Rev. W. A. Swift has just closed a camp meeting near Ripley, Tenn., which resulted in one hundred and eighty professions.

—The tabernacle meetings at Wessington Springs, S. Dak., were very successful. About 20 professions took place one night and 27 on another—about 150 up to the present time. Evangelist H. W. Bromley, Professor H. C. Maitland, Rev. V. D. Chaffin and Mrs. Bromley are uniting in the campaign.

—Miss Anna Agnes Smith, of Stapleton, N. Y., is the newly appointed superintendent of the Gospel Wagon work of Cincinnati, O. For thirteen years it has been in operation, and during that time many hundreds have been brought into the church. The city ministers take an active interest in the work.

—Dr. Smiley, of Denver, Colo., has just closed a four weeks' union meeting at Pueblo, Colo. One of the interesting features of his work was the testimony of men and women converted in his previous meetings. The music, under Mr. Hanson's leadership, was an attractive feature and included a chorus choir, a children's choir and a male quartette, with solos.

—Missionary W. Hagqvist, of the China Inland Mission, Kienchow, Shensi, China, has sent to The Christian Herald the names of seven native evangelists and three Bible-women, for whom it is desired to find support as workers in connection with the mission. Readers who wish to identify themselves with the China mission field by undertaking the support of one of these workers as a "personal substitute" in the field should write to The Christian Herald, New York City. The annual rate of support is $50, payable quarterly or half-yearly.

—Rev. Arturo Muston, president of the Waldensian Mission in Italy, writes to Dr. Klopsch from Rome: "You could not have sent a contribution to our Waldensian Mission in Italy at a better time. . . . When I had the pleasure of speaking to you here in Rome, I told you something of the wonderful awakening which is taking place here among the young clergy of the Roman Church. This movement has been intensified of late, and if our Protestant friends abroad could realize that the present crisis is a providential opportunity to bring back Italy to Christ and his glorious Gospel I am sure they would come forward liberally and put at our disposal what is necessary to cope with these long-prayed-for times of spiritual refreshment."

—In a letter from G. W. R., Harrisburg, Pa., to Rev. E. P. Hammond, the writer says: "I was one of the four hundred boys converted in your meetings in Harrisburg, Pa., in 1876—the toughest 'kid' of sixteen you had to deal with. After you left the city, about four hundred and fifty young people, all your converts, formed an association for personal work, to bring every boy and girl in Harrisburg to Christ. We carried on the work nearly ten years. I have good reasons to believe that our beloved 'C. E.' Society was the foundation of the famous Christian Endeavor. The old society is going to hold its first reunion, and we boys and girls of yours intend to come from all over the United States and Canada to be together. Our hearts would thrill with joy to have you with us. We will send this to The Christian Herald."

The Safest Way To Earn 6%

Investors—small or large—should inform themselves on Irrigation Bonds.

These bonds are secured by liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The value of the security is in many instances four times the loan. The first year's crop often sells for more than the loan—sometimes by several times over.

Some of these bonds are municipal obligations, like School Bonds. They form a tax lien on the real property within the district.

They are serial Bonds, so one may make short-time or long-time investments. Each year, as part of the bonds are paid, the security back of the rest is increased.

The bonds pay six per cent.—a higher rate than one can obtain on any other large class of bonds equally well secured.

The bonds are for $100, $500 and $1,000 so one may invest either little or much.

These are ideal bonds, and they have become the most popular bonds that we handle.

We are the largest dealers in Reclamation Bonds. In the past 15 years we have sold 70 separate issues, without a dollar of loss to any investor.

Now we have written a book based on all this experience, and the book is free. Please send this coupon to-day for it, for you owe to yourself a knowledge of the facts.

Christian Self-Denial

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE question of abstinence from intoxicants and narcotics is no longer a personal question. In our own land souls and bodies by the thousand are falling victims to drink. What is the true position of Christians with regard to this thing? Are we to go with the multitude to do evil? God forbid. Setting aside the question whether or not these things are good for us individually, from either the moral, physical or spiritual point of view, let us consider whether the use of them, on our part, helps to drag our brethren out of the mire or encourages them to wallow in it.

Paul, writing to the Corinthians, deals with the question of meat offered to idols. In the prevalent Pantheism, current among the Greeks of his day, a large proportion of the food which appeared on the table was that which had been offered in sacrifice to idols. He demonstrated clearly that an idol was nothing; that meat offered to idols could, in itself, neither do good nor harm; a man knowing this could eat it with impunity. But how about those who had not such knowledge, and whose weak conscience might be defiled? The apostle says, "Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak. For if any man see thee, which hast knowledge, sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are sacrificed to idols; and through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?"

The same reasoning may apply to everything in which we may "put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in our brother's way." If by our example some young man, or some weak, nervous woman; some workman or needlewoman is strengthened to make use of stimulants, and then succumbs to their increasing power and becomes a drunkard, dare we say that we are guiltless; dare we say we are innocent of the perdition of our weak brother or sister for whom Christ died? As living sacrifices—as living, not unto ourselves, but unto Him which died for us and rose again, it no longer belongs to us to regulate what we shall eat or what we drink. Where the Holy Ghost has driven a man to make an inventory of himself, and all he has, and to yield it up entirely to God, believing that he takes possession, we cannot see it possible for such an one to continue using intoxicants in a land like ours. "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died. . . . For meat destroy not the work of God. . . . It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is offended, or is made weak."

The heart of Jesus is ever to seek and to save the lost, to go out after the lost sheep until he find it. We cannot do this until our own hands are clean, not only from that which is absolutely sinful, but that which may hinder another. Gehazi had no power to awaken the Shunammite's child while the love of money still reigned in his own heart. The disciples had no power to cast out the unclean spirit from the child while the thought of which among them should be the greatest was occupying them. The Shunammite felt that the power of God was not in Gehazi; the father of the child testified to Jesus about his disciples, "They could not cast him out." No power but the power of the living God will ever fully overcome the power of Satan through the drink. Human efforts are poor things at best, but there is might in intercession which will do more than years of effort, as has been fully proved by the whisky war in America. But how can we pray in faith about this matter unless in our own lives we are entirely clear?

I Can Reduce Your Flesh Build Up Your Figure Correct Chronic Ailments

Would you like to accomplish these results by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have helped over 30,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

Too Fleshy? I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart, and relieve you of such chronic ailments as:

Constipation	Rheumatism	Dullness	Sleeplessness
Torpid Liver	Weakness	Irritability	Weak Nerves
Indigestion	Catarrh	Nervousness	Weak Heart

I strengthen whatever organs are weak; start your blood to circulating as when you were a child; teach you to breathe so the blood is fully purified.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

THE SURRENDER OF THE FRENCH TO THE GERMANS AT SEDAN

BISMARCK, the Iron Chancellor, and Von Moltke, the great German general, are the conspicuous figures in the famous Franco-Prussian War. The midnight surrender at Sedan is the most important event in German history. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, is but ONE of TWO THOUSAND in the complete work, and serves to illustrate but ONE event out of all the THOUSANDS which make up the history of every empire, kingdom, principality and Nation, all accurately and entertainingly told in the world-famed publication

RIDPATH'S HISTORY OF THE WORLD

Christian Herald Readers have shown wonderful appreciation of our remarkable offer on this great History. We have shipped this splendid work to delighted readers living in every state of the Union, to nearly all foreign nations, and to the far-away islands of the sea. OVER 200,000 SETS OF THIS MONUMENTAL WORK HAVE BEEN SOLD, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. More sets of Ridpath's History have been sold than of the Encyclopedia Britannica and the Century Dictionary combined. Can you imagine a greater testimonial for any set of books? The English-speaking world has endorsed this as the only History of the World worth having. The publisher's failure placed the entire unsold edition in our hands. The Christian Herald says:

"Ridpath's History of the World" may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. Wherever this history is read it cannot fail to have a powerful influence, not simply educational, but moral and spiritual as well. The History of the World has been warmly commended by our leading college professors, preachers and teachers, and by thousands of those who are foremost in all that makes for human progress and enlightenment. We cannot commend it too highly as a work that deserves a place in every American home.

THE REASON

for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of novels. Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. No need for us to tell you about Ridpath. The English-speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having. It is to-day in 200,000 American homes and is endorsed by Public Men, Educators, Business Men, the Clergy and everybody who knows history.

Why You Ought to Buy Ridpath's History Now

Because it is the only general history recognized everywhere as authority.

Because it is complete. It begins with the oldest civilization and gives the complete history of every country and every race; in fact, the history of mankind, including all achievements in war, discovery, invention, art, science, religion, philosophy and government.

Because it is the most beautifully illustrated of any historical work ever issued. It contains more than 2,000 illustrations. A famous educator has said that he considers the illustrations alone worth the entire cost of the set.

Because it will not only interest and instruct the average man or woman, but it will delight the children. It is so beautifully written that children will learn to love history reading. It will start them along the line of reading good things, of becoming interested in that which is true instead of reading novels and trashy literature.

Because the new ninth volume tells the story of recent, we might almost say, current events. It gives the complete history of the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, and the more recent Russia-Japan War. It brings the history of every nation right down to date.

Because Ridpath's History of the World is absolutely accurate and thoroughly reliable. Dr. Ridpath spent the span of an ordinary lifetime in writing the work.

Because this is your chance to buy it at a nominal price—much less than the work has ever been offered before or ever will be offered again—and you may pay in small sums monthly if you prefer.

OUR LAST CALL

IN our last week's issue we hinted at some compensation or "reward" to those of our subscribers who would help us to circulate our beautiful Holiday Supplement, by sending us a list of 25 names and addresses.

The Christian Herald always endeavors to compensate its subscribers in some commensurate manner for their kind co-operation in extending its influence and circulation; but we have already done so much on that line that it is not an easy task to select an article that will prove attractive and "worth while" without incurring too great a financial sacrifice. In this instance, however, we have been unusually fortunate.

Miniature* Reproduction of "Golden Hours"—*Full Size 15x21 Inches

We are now prepared to announce that by special arrangement with the Berlin Photographic Company, we are enabled to offer, on the terms stated below, Elsley's world-famed picture, "Golden Hours," measuring 15 x 21 inches.

ACT TO-DAY

To be able to give this picture for a list of twenty-five names is exceptionally gratifying to us, and we congratulate our subscribers and ourselves on our very good fortune. And now that we have satisfactorily closed our arrangements with the Berlin Photographic Company for this genuine work of art, we trust that every one of our subscribers, without exception, will take advantage of this extraordinary opportunity.

"Golden Hours" will bring sunshine into every home to which it is sent, and for many years prove "a thing of beauty and a joy forever."

We are delighted with the beauty of this reward, inasmuch as it affords us an opportunity to give generous and practical expression to our high appreciation of our subscribers' cheerful and helpful co-operation.

Please read the lower half of this page, and kindly bear in mind that the last date for mailing your list is October 1, 1909.

WHAT WE ARE STRIVING TO DO

WE have in preparation the most artistic HOLIDAY CIRCULAR ever issued. It is Superbly Illustrated in Beautiful Colors. Of course, we shall send a copy to all of our regular subscribers as soon as issued. Besides, we are just now straining every nerve to greatly enlarge our Subscription List, and are printing a million extra copies of this circular, in order to reach and influence people who ought to be subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but are not now on our list. Hence we need more names and addresses. THEREFORE:

To every member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD FAMILY who will send us a list of 25 Names in accordance with the conditions set forth in our SPECIAL OFFER—which see below—together with ten cents in coin or stamps to cover the cost of postage, packing and handling, we will deliver FREE one of the exquisite Artistic Engravings of which we give a miniature reproduction above. There is no further expense attached to this offer, and we guarantee to deliver the picture securely packed, uncreased and in perfect condition.

A PERSONAL WORD TO YOU

You who are already subscribers, know THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. You know what it stands for. You love it and are interested in the extension of its work and influence. It will require only a little effort on your part to send us the names of 25 adult Church or Sunday School workers who would welcome a beautiful circular, full of interesting information, handsomely illustrated in colors, and sent to them absolutely free of all expense.

We feel sure that you will be glad to lend us a friendly hand in our effort to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with its message of love and cheer into more homes throughout the land, and so to you we appeal for the names necessary to carry out this extensive and expensive propaganda. You can supply these names; you will supply them, and on you we rely to that extent for the successful outcome of our undertaking.

While we are fully satisfied that the thought of compensation would never occur to any of our readers in connection with this labor of love, we want to show our hearty appreciation of their kind co-operation, and so have made special arrangements with the Photographische Gesellschaft of Berlin, Paris, London and New York, which enable us to send to every friend who helps us in our endeavor, the beautiful Art Reproduction described and illustrated above.

CLOSING DATE OCTOBER 1.

Please remember that the closing date for the mailing of your list is October 1st, 1909. This is positively the last mailing day.

CONDITIONS OF OUR OFFER

This offer will be open only to our SUBSCRIBERS and their immediate FAMILIES, and every list sent in must close with this declaration:

"I am a subscriber."

OR:—

"My ..... (Here state relationship) is a subscriber."

and be signed by the name and address of the sender.

The names which may be sent in under this offer must be Adult Protestant Church or Sunday School Attendants, ☞ No Two Living in the Same House.

These names must be written on only One Side of the Sheet. You may use more than one sheet in a single list, but you must not write on both sides.

Every name must have a Prefix (such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Dr., Prof., Rev.), Christian Name (as Mary, John, etc.), Post-Office Address, County and State. In case of Free Delivery Office in city or country, either the Street Address or the number of the Rural Free Delivery route should be supplied. Thus an address correctly supplied would read something like this:

Dr. James Potter, Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., 572 Adams Street

OR:—

Miss Ruth Jackson, Westminster, Worcester Co., Mass., R.F.D. No. 6

To get the beautiful picture mentioned above, you must enclose ten cents in stamps or coin with the list, and mail to us On or Before October 1.

Lists that are not posted on or before that date cannot be considered.

☞ IMPORTANT: When you send in a list never send any other communication in the same envelope, as the lists are handled in a separate department.

Havoc Wrought by the Flood in a Street in Monterey

View Along the River Front After the Waters Began to Subside

HELPING MONTEREY'S SUFFERERS

EARLY reports from flood-stricken Monterey, in Mexico, gave only an account of the great loss of life and the damage to the buildings in the city itself. Now that the railroads and the telegraph lines to other parts of the stricken district have been to some extent repaired a more accurate idea of the situation is being arrived at, and Consul-General Hanna telegraphed to our State Department that the storms and floods have caused great suffering and destitution from the Gulf of Mexico on one side to nearly the Rio Grande on the other. He makes a second strong appeal for aid for the destitute people of Monterey. The path of devastation runs northwest and southeast. There has been much loss of life outside the city, and the number of those who were drowned or crushed in the floating masses of grinding wreckage is now put at three thousand. This makes it an even greater tragedy than the Johnstown (Pa.) flood, where two thousand people were swept to death in a few minutes by the breaking of the South Fork Reservoir, several miles above town.

At this writing only two-thirds of the district affected by storm and flood has been heard from, so that it is very probable that the figures given will be materially enlarged as soon as complete reports are received at Monterey. A large number of small towns in the State of Nuevo Leon have been wiped out of existence, their sites marked only by some crumbling ruins, half covered with a thick coating of mud. The few people who could manage to escape took to the mountains, leaving their household possessions behind.

The unidentified dead are being hastily buried in long trenches in the cemeteries as soon as they are brought in. There is danger of an epidemic from this source, as the people are drinking from wells, for the water pipes had burst during the storm and the works were damaged. Already there are many cases of typhoid. Hundreds of bodies are probably in the mud in the lower reaches of the river.

On this page are given the first authentic photographs taken during the flood and also at the time the waters of the Santa Catarina were beginning to subside. They were sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Consul-General Hanna, who had charge of the distribution of the money telegraphed to Monterey by the proprietor of this paper. The one showing the whirlpool of the river the morning after the Santa Catarina made its phenomenal rise shows the peculiar action of the angry waters in shaving off the banks as with a gigantic knife. The banks are cut away in this manner for nearly four miles. The broken pier of the bridge at the right gives a vivid idea of the force of the waves as they tore down the valley from the mountains, stone and mortar at length giving way. There was no chance of the frail adobe dwellings lasting but for a brief time.

The river during the first day had much the appearance of a lake in a violent storm, as it swept through the city in great waves, carrying with it the debris of houses and the bodies of unfortunate victims who had been caught in their homes by the flood or who had been unable to reach high land before they were engulfed by the oncoming flood. When the Santa Catarina was at its highest it was three-quarters of a mile wide.

The Whirlpool of the Flood, the Santa Catarina River in the Midst of the Storm

One-third of Monterey has been wrecked; many of the structures still standing near the river front are so damaged that they will have to be pulled down. The streets are washed out; great holes filled with water make traffic not only difficult but an actual source of danger to life and limb. A number of adobe buildings along some of the main streets, undermined by the water, have since fallen, killing their occupants. As a result large numbers who have homes still standing are in constant fear until materials can be secured to repair them. This, under present unsettled conditions, will take some time.

One of the photographs shows a point well back from the water front, and gives a good idea of the present state of roadways and buildings. An enormous amount of mud was brought down from the steep mountain sides by innumerable rivulets and emptied into the river, which, in turn, distributed it over the greater part of Monterey. Even where the streets are not washed out there is a layer of

FLAMING ENERGY

Text:—II. Tim. 1:6
"Stir up the gift of God which is in thee."

LET us find in the text an appeal for individuality. Equality of right does not involve equality of powers. As some homes are richly furnished and some almost bare, as some laboratories are finely equipped and some meagerly, so human lives vary in their furnishing, souls vary in their equipment. These differences are native to the soul. There are differences of development which are due to circumstances, but root differences of power are native. This is true in nature, and is admitted by the scientific teaching of the day. Circumstances, surroundings have their influence on living organisms, but cannot explain the varieties of life. There is an interior, original force which determines the organization of the plant. This is a truth which is recognized in the world of human life in a greater degree every year. Our educational system is governed by it. In primary stages of education the teacher may instruct in many branches of learning. But as the mind develops, and fundamentals are more or less thoroughly mastered, teachers are assigned, not according to the ages of the pupils, but according to the branches to be taught. A teacher becomes a professor of a distinct line of study, a specialist. In the curriculum of the college, electives are finding more favor. Students are permitted to choose the studies of their course. As knowledge becomes more extensive, the universal scholar becomes an unknown quantity. Out in the practical work of the busy world the same truth is more and more enforced. The larger the trade establishment the more definite is the division of labor—a salesman must be limited to one line of goods in the great general stores. In the industrial world, specialization is the order of the day. In intricate manufacturing, the workman must no longer be able to make the whole product, as was once true. He need only contribute his part. Increased output and variety of machinery have narrowed the skill and concentrated the energy of the artisan. Paul's famous words, "This one thing I do," with its suggestion of intense energy and single purpose, might characterize our modern world. And this is the suggestion of the text. Paul reminds Timothy that he has a special endowment, for this word "gift" means not only that Timothy is the possessor of special benefit, but that he is endowed with a special power.

Individual Endowments

Emerson says: "Each man has his own vocation. The talent is the call. There is one direction in which all space is open to him. He is like a ship in a river; he runs against obstacles on every side but one, from that side all obstruction is taken away, and he sweeps serenely over a deepening channel into an infinite sea."

Our special endowments: Have we any? And, if so, how may we know them? We are indeed "quotations from our ancestors." But that is only part of the truth. There are resemblances, clearly discerned inheritances always, but there are individual qualities which we cannot account for by the law of inheritance, original statements as well as quotations in the volume of our life. We are not simply re-issues of our parents. And it is by our attention to any unique, individual force, by our development of it, that we may pass on our inheritance enlarged and enriched.

We may discover ourselves by exploration of the geographical order. As the bold voyager tempts trackless, unknown seas in the attempt to stand upon the distant land which exists not upon maps, but in his faith; as the explorer in adventurous spirit blazes new pathways through dense forests and solitary wildernesses, and finds high mountains and broad seas; so we have entered the pathways of life, led by trusted guides, to make discoveries of truth and self. Perhaps you are in the wilderness of study, which sometimes seems dreary and desolate enough. You may come to know some of your own mental aptitudes in your journeyings. As you pursue this search further, let this thought of self-discovery attend you. You are getting not merely information on various lines of knowledge to serve you in future needs. You are getting life revelations, suggestions of personal power, coming across signboards to direct you in life's journey. Or you are out on the restless sea of human toil. As you use the opportunities to do work of some kind, find in the work not only the opportunity to earn money, but the opportunity to know yourself, your fitness or lack of it for the work in hand. Note whether there is ease, zest, power in your toil; whether it is pleasure or drudgery. Or we may do some exploring of the geological or archæological order.

As the delver after the secrets of the rocks or buried treasures of ancient civilizations digs with pick and shovel down into the secret dark places of the earth, so go down into the interiors of your life, study your inclinations, your wishes, your tastes; analyze your imagination, memory, reason, will; know your instinctive leanings and pay attention to them. Know whether you can make vivid mental pictures of things unseen, whether you can reason clearly, whether you can remember well; whether you can decide quickly and execute strongly. It is the bread-and-butter argument which will persuade most of you to work, and the same argument which will induce you to take whatever opening comes. But at least have an earnest wish to find your niche in life. Do not fancy you have discovered your mission of necessity in the toil which gives you something to do and wear. Be earnest and faithful and you will soon know whether there is kinship between your toil and yourself. If not in your hours of toil, then at least in your moments of leisure seek expression for your individual force. The use of leisure has often determined the destiny of a life.

Talents that Lie Idle

"Stir up." It is a picturesque word. It means a stirring into flame, into living fire. There are embers with glowing hearts, but dull ashen surfaces. There are smouldering sparks; give them attention, air, fuel. Make them blaze into free, royal flame. "Stir up" your forces. Tools are kept bright by use. It is diligence rather than equipment that determines values ultimately. Energy with small ability will be a mightier combination than laziness with large ability. In the parable of the talents it was industry, not equipment, that received the reward. The faithful servants were unequal in talent, but equal in diligence, and they received the same approving decision. There are multitudes of people who have ability and do nothing. They are like well-equipped workshops, from which no manufactured products ever issue; the bands and wheels and tools of which are still and useless. Many people have had careful training, have had their life force brought to a high state of efficiency, have become rich in attainments, and their accomplishments are hoarded like a miser's treasures, and their forces sleep. They do not flame, they smoulder. "Stir into flame the gift within thee." Turner, the great English painter, before one of whose landscapes Ruskin stood and studied eight hours a day for weeks, when asked by a lady what his secret was replied: "I have no secret, madam, but hard work." Genius is an infinite capacity for taking pains. Energy will make an endowment seem greater than it is. A Spartan youth, who complained to his mother that his sword was too short, was told to add a step to it.

The Power of Well-Directed Effort

Now, of course, energy involves purpose. There must be an end in view. Industry does not mean merely action, it means action plus direction—ability directed to certain ends. A ship without a rudder on a tossing sea is in action, but there is no progress. If we seek not only movement, but progress for our gift of power, we must have purpose. What a lot of aimless lives there are! "Stir into flame the gift within thee." Not thoughtlessly, recklessly, with no consideration of health, consuming your life, reducing your vital fuel to ashes and smoke too quickly by forced draught; not selfishly that you may sit dreamily in the flickering light of your fire to enjoy its glow; but manfully "stir into flame" your powers, remembering that flame has uses. Be it your purpose to add something of heat and light to a world that needs all the power and truth it can get. Carlyle said: "The latest Gospel in this world is 'Know thy work and do it, know what thou canst work at and work at it like a Hercules.' An endless significance lies in work. Foul jungles are cleared away. Fair seed fields rise instead and stately cities, and withal the man himself ceases to be a foul jungle thereby. Consider how, even in the meanest sorts of labor, the whole soul of a man is composed to a real sort of harmony the instant he sets himself to work!

"The Blessed Glow of Labor"

"Doubt, desire, sorrow, remorse, indignation, despair itself, all these lie like hell dogs beleaguering the soul of the day laborer, as of every man. But he bends himself with free valor against his task, and all these are stilled, all these shrink, murmuring, far off into their caves. The blessed glow of labor is in the man, as purifying fire, wherein all poison is burned up and sour smoke itself thereby is made blessed flame." It is true that there is a protective power in earnest work, and high, noble purpose is a moral insurance policy. It means not only hardness for the body and tonic for the mind; it means also fibre and beauty for the moral life. Satan does "find mischief for idle hands to do." It is not always true that idle hands do the mischief that Satan provides opportunity for, but it is immensely better to have the hands so full of work that he will not feel under the same sort of obligation to provide tasks for them as he is when appealed to by their emptiness. A lofty aim and determination to settle upon some good, useful work by which man will be served in some one or other of his many needs will be taking a long step toward sanctification.

The Sin of Selfish Display

There is, to be sure, a danger connected with this "stirring into flame" the power we may be equipped with. It makes that power visible. And we know it is visible. We are tempted to make our gifts bright that men may see them. There is a danger that display shall become the end we have in view; to "stir up" our gifts into such commotion that men may marvel and praise, and we be diligent in providing the right conditions of hearth and air and flue, so that our fire may make a fine show. There is certainly that temptation to think more of the manifestation of our powers than of the helpful, useful movement of those powers to lofty ends. But we will be kept in check by our own self-respect, rebuked by conscience, tethered by the supreme necessity of having our own approval, for, after all, our interior, approving word is worth more than the praises of men. We cannot get along comfortably without self-respect. This necessity, to say nothing of a higher motive and force yet to be named, will guard us from the fuss and flare of a mere selfish display. The discovery of our powers, the energetic use of our powers, remember these duties. Be individual. Be earnest.

'Tis as easy to be heroes, as to sit the idle slaves
Of a legendary virtue carved upon our fathers' graves,
Worshipers of light ancestral make the present light a crime—
Was the Mayflower launched by cowards, steered by men behind their time?
Turn those tracks toward past or future that make Plymouth Rock sublime?

New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still and onward, who would keep abreast of truth.

Devotion. "The gift of God." Discover your power, develop your power, recognize God as the author of your power. How little there is of this practical recognition among men! God feeds us, he clothes us and shelters us. We are ready, at least theoretically, to admit God as the source of supply in our pressing need. He made these materials which minister to us, though we seem indeed practically blind to that often enough. We praise ourselves and worship ourselves because of our successes. And yet the merest bit of analysis of our provisions and clothing and houses will show us God as the giver of these things. And if he is the author of all substance, is he not also the author of all

OPENING THE BIG GUNNISON TUNNEL

ON September 23 President Taft will spend a few hours at the little town of Montrose, on the western slope of the Colorado Rockies, for the purpose of pressing the button that will release the waters of the Gunnison River into the great tunnel that is designed to conduct them to the arid valley of the Uncompahgre. This marks the practical completion of the most spectacular irrigation enterprise ever undertaken by any government—an enterprise that, in its inception, was denounced as impractical and ridiculed as the phantasy of a hair-brained dreamer.

When fully completed the Uncompahgre project, of which the Gunnison tunnel is the essential feature, will cost about $4,000,000. It ranks third in cost of the twenty-seven irrigation projects so far undertaken by the National Reclamation Service and fifth in importance, as measured by the amount of land that will be reclaimed. In the magnitude and novelty of the engineering difficulties that have been encountered and overcome it has no rival among all the world's irrigation enterprises. Furthermore, it is the first of the government's irrigation projects of magnitude to be completed and ready for operation. Its success marks the triumph of the great scheme of national reclamation contemplated by the Hansborough-Newlands law.

The situation that made necessary the construction of the Gunnison tunnel was unusual if not unique. The small Uncompahgre River flows down from the fantastically sculptured Uncompahgre Mountains, through a broad and fertile valley. Utilized to the utmost, the waters of theUncompahgre were capable of irrigating not more than one-tenth of the arable land in the valley. On the other hand, the Gunnison River is a large and important stream, that flows through the constricted gorge known as the Black Canyon of the Gunnison and then through a valley so narrow that it could not absorb one-tenth of the water readily available for irrigation. To take the waters of the Gunnison from the narrow gorges where they were of no use to the broad valley of the Uncompahgre, where they were needed, was the problem that confronted the engineers. The two valleys are separated by a range of mountains, rising 2,000 feet above the level of either stream. Plainly, the only possible way of getting the wasted waters of the Gunnison to the arid valley of the Uncompahgre was to tunnel clear through the mountains.

The Uncompahgre River at the West Entrance to the Great Tunnel

This tunnel has at last been completed, and now awaits only the formality of official "opening." It is 6 miles long, 10½ feet wide and 12½ feet high, being the greatest tunnel ever constructed for purposes of irrigation. In its construction unheard-of and unanticipated difficulties were met with. Great floods of water were encountered at intervals, and some of these subterranean streams were boiling hot. Once, an underground lake was tapped, and had to be pumped dry. As the tunnel was driven in both directions, constant pumping was necessary at the Gunnison (or higher) portal. The average discharge from the pumps was 250,000 gallons per day, but at times it exceeded 750,000 gallons daily. The flow of hot water at times made the interior of the tunnel almost intolerably torrid, and at one time carbon dioxide (or choke-damp) threatened the workmen with asphyxiation. To get rid of the gas a ventilating shaft had to be sunk from the top of the mountain, delaying work at one end of the tunnel for three weeks. For 500 feet the tunnel was driven through a remarkable bed of fossils, consisting mostly of sea shells, soft and crumbling, which necessitated a special system of timbering. Then a cloud-burst occurred in the canyon, destroying machinery and buildings necessary to the progress of the work and delaying operations for weeks.

As fast as the tunnel was driven through the rock it was timbered and then lined with concrete. The interior consists of solid concrete, constructed to withstand the wear and tear of ages. Through this smooth cement waterway will rush a body of water nine feet deep, with a volume of 1,300 cubic feet every second. After passing through the six-mile tunnel, twelve miles of main canal conduct it to the bed of the Uncompahgre. From the bed of the Uncompahgre smaller canals branch in both directions, and these in turn subdivide into ditches, with an aggregate length of hundreds of miles, providing for the irrigation of 150,000 acres of remarkably fertile land. The area of land "under the ditch," under the old irrigation systems that utilized the waters of the Uncompahgre to the limit, was only 20,000 acres. This bringing of the waters of the Gunnison through the mountain to the valley of the Uncompahgre, therefore, means the addition of 130,000 acres to Colorado's irrigated empire. In its natural state this land would be dear at $10 per acre. Irrigated and planted in fruit trees, it is considered "cheap" at $1,000 an acre.

Driving the Tunnel in the Heart of the Mountains

From the west portal of the Gunnison tunnel to the point where the main canal enters the Uncompahgre River there is a fall of 214 feet, which will be used for the generation of hydro-electric power. This will be used, in part, in lighting the entire Uncompahgre Valley, including the town of Montrose; and in time this great source of power will attract important industries to the western slope.

Montrose is preparing for the greatest crowd ever seen in that rather isolated section of the country. Practically every house in the town will be opened for the entertainment of strangers, and halls, warehouses and storerooms are being fitted with cots and mattresses. One thousand army tents will be put in a "tent city," close to the town, if necessary. JOHN L. COWAN.

power? Are we indebted to him only for material and independent of him in all the rest of the process of our building by which we erect social, material and intellectual structures? See God's method. He builds trees, not houses; gives wool and cotton, not garments; wheat and corn, not bread. He buries the minerals and looses the forces. We must cut the trees, and shear the sheep, and grind the wheat, and dig into the earth, and reach into the heavens; that is, we must exert our forces. But the briefest history of our forces will lead us back to God. The conclusion is inevitable; he gives power as well as substance. God is our patron. He has endowed us.

Men recognize God as the author of great forces. They find him in great material and historical displays of force. Science dreams of a great comprehensive force yet to be known, of which the known forces are but aspects. Theology names that ultimate force "God." Jesus calls the ultimate God "Father," and so adds intelligence and love to power. For the explanation of the sum of all things we cannot get along without God. And looking back over great historical movements, we can find him. There is a philosophy of history because history is the plan of God. One can see how God's own touch on human hearts has influenced the world in many departments of its life. Mr. Benjamin Kidd thinks that religious beliefs occupy a high place in human history, that such beliefs are not the expression of the childhood of the race, but are the characteristic feature and determining force of its social development. A religious movement, the Reformation, had much to do with the free Netherlands, with the constitutional liberties of old England, with republican France and free America. Religious enthusiasts gave form to our own political institutions. Out of their religious freedom came our political liberty.

In great historical crises we can feel God. Feel, as did Victor Hugo, when he said: "In the battle of Waterloo God has passed by. Bonaparte, victor at Waterloo, does not come within the law of the nineteenth century. Napoleon had been denounced in the councils of the Infinite and his fall determined upon. He embarrassed God." We, too, can feel God in these great historical emergencies, as we can in material forces. Then why not feel him as easily in personal matters and personal forces? You have some special power, equipment, training for life's work. It is "the gift of God." Worship him. Do not limit that to those who have genius. If you see a man a very storehouse of splendid ability, you can feel that God equipped him. That God made the great artists and poets, and statesmen and jurists, and physicians and commercial geniuses is comparatively easy to believe. But a little ordinary insight, skill with speech, or skill with hand, did he give that too? Yes, that too. God told Moses at the making of the tabernacle that he had filled Bezaleel with his spirit to enable him "to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass," with "all manner of cunning workmanship."

God gave you whatever power you are stocked with. Recognize that and thank him, and ask his guidance in the use of what he has given, and feel that the work in life which the power suggests is God's choice for you, and be content, and feel the glory of the work which he has planned, and prosecute it always in his spirit and fear. Our work must never be separated from him. The South Sea Islanders have a singular tradition to account for the existence of dew. The legend says that in the beginning the earth touched the sky, that being the Golden Age, when all was beautiful and good; then some dreadful catastrophe occurred, the earth and sky were torn asunder, as we see them now, and the dew drops of the morning are the tears that nature sheds over the sad divorce. There is beautiful truth in the fable. In separation from God is our sorrow and our defeat, in communion with him is our glory and peace and progress.

"THE SINGING OF THE CHILDREN AT MONT-LAWN HAS ALL THE 'GO' AND 'SNAP' THAT APPEAL TO A CHILD'S HEART TO-DAY"

OUR LITTLE SINGERS AT MONT-LAWN

A Bostonian's Impressions of a Visit to Our Children's Home

By JOE MITCHELL CHAPPLE
Editor National Magazine, Boston

WHAT A DAY it was at the Children's Paradise! Of all the happy times recorded in my Pleasure Book those hours with the little folk are among the brightest of the summer play days.

That Sunday, as we drove up the hill between the massive stone pillars that might have graced a baronial gateway, the children rushed down to the fence and gave us a hearty cheer and a happy greeting. Such keen, bright faces, and every nationality represented—Protestants, Jews, Gentiles, Catholics—all rosy, cheerful little people, such as take hold of the heart tendrils. When the Doctor asked in his genial way, "Who likes pie?" every hand went up straight and quick, and there was an equally ready response to other questions.

The secret of the splendid discipline and peace at Mont-Lawn, combined with perfect freedom, lies in the fact that each group has its own teacher, who is in charge of about twenty-five children. The masterly way in which those battalions of children were handled would surprise even the clock-work officials of the German army. If any one has an idea that children cannot be happy in an orderly atmosphere he should sit on that veranda, as we did, watching the little ones and drinking in the beauties of that lovely view.

The climax of the day was reached in the Children's Temple. No laggards in Sunday School attendance here. In fact, they were crowding about the door long before the hour, waiting for the bell to ring, that they might march in. The little kindergarten scholars stood erect, like a small regiment, waiting to sing their special song.

What singing there was! The music had all the "go" and snap that appeal to a child's heart of to-day, while suggesting ideals and purposes that will permeate their lives as they grow older. Never have I heard a more patriotic burst of song than No. 17, "Hurrah for Our Flag, Our Country's Flag." The moment the last note was sung each little hand pointed to the flag. It was an impressive ceremony when that chorus of treble voices repeated: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Boys sat on one side, girls on the other. A number of part-songs were given, the boys responding to the queries of the girls:

"Can we see the flowers grow?" asked the girls.

"No, no, no," sang the boys.

"It pays to be good," the girls sweetly insisted.

"It never pays to be bad," replied the young urchins on the other side, with impressive fervor.

A wide range of human emotion was touched in the songs, and the children appeared ready to sing all day. That music, and the song responses of the Bible verses, were a form of worship worthy of a cathedral and impressive as any chanted ritual. The Twenty-third Psalm was repeated with an emphasis and inflection that cling to the memory. The old favorite song of children, "When He Cometh to Make Up His Jewels," was not omitted. Everything carried the grown-up members of the congregation back to youthful days, and we wondered once more why the world could not always look as it does to the eye of childhood—full of goodness and innocent gaiety.

Some of the hymns were set to popular airs that the city children were sure to know—the chorus "G, Double-O, D, Good," rang out, which was "Harriganesque." All the music had a suggestion of the New York swing that must have made the little people feel quite at home. As the children were singing the chorus, "Mont-Lawn bells, ring, oh ring; join the chorus with the birds that sing," the chimes in the tower sounded an accompaniment with impressive effect.

The exercises continued for nearly two hours, yet the youthful congregation did not become restless. Now and then there was a short recess, and the children fanned themselves and moved about in the seats, changing their position.

Every year has seen some addition to the original plan of Dr. Klopsch. Fourteen years ago he started the Children's Paradise on beautiful grounds overlooking the Hudson, opposite Tarrytown, where the millionaires seek seclusion and rest. There were trees, flowers and all those things that city children dream of but rarely see. As contributions have come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to provide for the entertainment of the little guests, the work has been extended. Every Saturday and Sunday finds Dr. Klopsch at Mont-Lawn among the children. This work has advanced so rapidly that it is impossible to say to what proportions it may grow in the future.

OCEAN GROVE'S GREATEST "LOVE FEAST"

AMONG the dwellers in Ocean Grove, and the many thousands of visitors to that famous religious resort, the camp meeting of 1909 will be remembered as the greatest in the Grove's history and the closing "love feast" as the most delightful. One of the most impressive features of the camp meeting was a communion service, at which Bishop Luther B. Wilson presided, assisted by one hundred ministers. This solemn service, participated in by thousands, was a sight not soon to be forgotten. There were many other notable spiritual features, including testimony meetings in the big Auditorium, men's meetings, twilight meetings, sunrise meetings, beach meetings and meetings of the various church and missionary societies. This year the music at the Grove has been unusually excellent. In addition to the great organ, there have been large choirs of specially trained voices, leading choristers and a quartet of cornetists.

Bishop Goodsell

One of the twilight meetings had for its leader Miss Helen Gertrude Rumsey, a bright young college girl. This was one of the best meetings on the camp ground. Miss Rumsey was surrounded by twenty-five young ladies, some as singers and some as ushers. Mrs. Ganse was cornetist and Myron W. Morse, a well-known composer, was director of the singing. Miss Rumsey is a consecrated worker and organizer. She was born at Chautauqua, and is an evangelist under the Young Women's Temperance Union.

On the last great day of the camp meeting there were continuous meetings from 5:45 A.M. until 10:30 P.M. The "love feast" in the Auditorium at 9 A.M. called out a vast congregation. Dr. Ballard had charge, and Tali Esen Morgan led the singing. Mrs. W. B. Osborne, widow of Rev. Dr. Osborne, who discovered Ocean Grove, was present and spoke, as well as Mrs. Stokes, widow of Rev. Dr. Stokes. Amanda Smith, the colored evangelist, started the hymn:

He's the Lily of the Valley, the Bright and Morning Star, and the people took up the chorus. Then some one sang "Oh, Beulah Land." The Twilight Choir sang the "Old-time Religion," ending with the words:

It's good for everybody, and it's good enough for me.

Some one said, "I wish President Eliot had been here this week; he would have rewritten his creed."

At 10:30 A.M. Bishop Goodsell preached on Gen. 3:8, "And they heard the voice of the Lord God." At 4 o'clock a Pentecostal meeting was held, and many testimonies given. At 6, the twilight meeting was held. There was some very enthusiastic singing, an especial favorite being "The Old Camp Ground." Miss Rumsey then called Miss Annie Hughes, a daughter of the late Rev. George Hughes, to the platform. She rose to speak of her conversion and that of her sister, now a missionary in China. She said: "I am just as sure now of my conversion and acceptance with God as I was at the time of my conversion," when she suddenly fell forward. Several persons ran to her and lifted her up, removing her to the rear room. It was thought that she had merely fainted, but three physicians, who were hurriedly summoned, said she had expired instantly of heart failure. This sad incident filled the camp with sorrow.

Helen Gertrude Rumsey

The praying and singing were kept up until 10:30 P.M. on the closing day. As the last hymn, "When the Roll Is Called Up Yonder," was sung many of the worshipers were in tears.

The march around Zion took place next morning. As the column halted in the temple, where death had entered only a few hours before, a prayer for comfort for the afflicted was offered up. All were deeply affected as Dr. Ballard gave out the final hymn, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again," which was followed by the benediction.

Peary Also Reaches the North Pole

WITHIN a week after the announcement of Dr. Frederick A. Cook's discovery of the North Pole, and while honors were being showered upon the explorer abroad by royalty and by the leading scientific societies of Europe, a cable dispatch from Indian Harbor, Labrador, from Commander Robert E. Peary, U. S. N., was received in New York containing the startling news that he, too, had returned to civilization after successfully reaching the Pole. It said briefly:

"I have the Pole, April 6. Expect to arrive Chateau Bay, September 7.
PEARY."

This strange conjunction of events—the discovery of the Pole by two Americans within a year of each other, and the receipt of the news of both discoveries practically in the same week—formed what is probably the most remarkable coincidence in the whole history of scientific exploration. Scientific societies here and abroad were surprised and delighted at the news. Commander Peary's first brief message was followed by several others, in which he repeated the assurance of his polar success, adding, figuratively, that he had "nailed the Stars and Stripes to the Pole." He also wires that the expeditionary steamer Roosevelt was safe, and that the year had been "the best year of his life." One of the messages was addressed to his wife at South Harpswell, Me., where she has been spending the summer. Another was to Herbert L. Bridgman, secretary of the Peary Arctic Club. Following these, cablegrams were received from Donald B. McMillan, who accompanied Peary to the Arctic, which confirmed the explorer's claim of success.

In European scientific circles the news of Peary's exploit excited almost as much interest and discussion as that of Dr. Cook's triumphant dash to the Pole had done a week before. Peary was at Indian Harbor, Labrador, in the best of health and spirits, and enthusiastic over his success, when he was told that Dr. Cook had already announced the finding of the Pole. Peary and his associates were greatly surprised, but he declined to make any further statement at that time beyond saying that they had found no trace of any previous expedition.

When his search party reached the Roosevelt, on their return from the long trip over the Northern ice, the crew assembled on the deck and gave Peary a rousing welcome, cheering him again and again. He expressed gratification at the successful completion of his life-work. No particulars of the expedition were transmitted from Indian Harbor beyond the simple fact of its accomplished task. Unfavorable weather had set in, and it was expected that the trip of the Roosevelt to Red Bay, Labrador, where the first telegraph station is located, would be a tedious one. A brief outline of the itinerary was transmitted to London and New York from Battle Harbor.

Before leaving Indian Harbor, the following message was sent by wireless by Commander Peary:

"INDIAN HARBOR, LABRADOR (by wireless via Cape Ray, N. F.), September 8.—To Melville E. Stone, Associated Press, New York: Have nailed Stars and Stripes to North Pole. This is authoritative and correct. Cook's story should not be taken too seriously. The two Eskimos who accompanied him say he went no distance north and not out of sight of land. Other members of the tribe corroborate their story. PEARY."

A similar message was received by the Reuter Telegraph Company in London. This dispatch, which raises the issue sharply between the two explorers, has caused a tremendous sensation on both continents. The German geographers took the position that Cook's claim should stand until it was disproved. In France, the sentiment strongly favored Peary, and the French journals generally credited his claim of discovery. The feeling in Copenhagen, where Dr. Cook had received distinguished honors, was one of anxiety. The Danish geographical authorities had already accepted Dr. Cook's statements, but now a change of opinion began to take place. In England, the claim of Peary was instantly accepted, and an acute controversy between the rival explorers was looked for. Lieutenant E. H. Shackleton, the English explorer, said that if the records showed that Peary's speed on the last journey to the Pole coincided with that of Dr. Cook, that fact would go a good way toward explaining much of the present difficulty. He considered it unlikely that the metal cylinder left by Cook could be found by any one, as it had probably gone with the ice drift.

Scientists on both continents are now waiting for the detailed evidence to be submitted by the explorers in support of their respective claims. In American geographical circles it is considered most unfortunate that such a dispute should have arisen, since it can only be settled when the most complete records and scientific observations have been presented to and passed upon by a competent authority, either the London Geographical Society or the American Arctic Exploration Society. Besides affirming that Dr. Cook never reached the Pole, Commander Peary has charged that his food stores, his trained Eskimos and even his sledge dogs were used by his rival, to all of which Dr. Cook gives a quiet denial, declining to discuss the subject until it comes up before the proper tribunal. He has declared that he is ready to place all his journals and figures and worked out observations before a joint assembly of the world's scientific bodies, and to abide by their decision.

In Denmark, Dr. Cook's apparently unruffled calm under the strain of these charges was a subject of general comment. His manner seemed to inspire confidence. When he arrived at Copenhagen, on the steamer Hans Egede, he was dressed roughly like a sailor before the mast. He walked ashore arm in arm with the Crown Prince. In his conversations with the Danish scientists and men of rank he spoke modestly of his journey. He told them he did not claim to have stood upon the exact axis of the earth, but he had reached the point where all meridians met and latitudes ended. He believed that his calculations would show that he had skirted the Pole and that the exact point was at least within gunshot of where he had stood.

He lectured before an aristocratic audience in the capital on September 6, and was decorated with the gold medal of the Royal Danish Geographical Society, the King and royal family being present. The lecturer paid a tribute to Peary's success, and said the latter could hardly have come across his tracks at the Pole. He desired no controversy. A banquet followed the lecture.

Commander Peary will probably reach New York about the end of the present month, or early in October, and Dr. Cook about September 23.

Commander Peary's narrative of his Arctic quest was transmitted to London and New York from Battle Harbor, Labrador, by Marconi wireless on September 9. Editorially, the New York Times says his journey was the most perilous and amazing ever recorded in the history of exploration. "Nothing was left to chance. Knowledge, painfully gained by practice, and a thorough equipment, helped the expedition to success."

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—ON SEPTEMBER 26, in the old Jerry McAuley Mission, 316 Water Street, New York, Superintendent John H. Wyburn will celebrate the twenty-first anniversary of his conversion from a life of drunkenness and sin.

—MISSIONARY GEORGE S. MCCUNE, of the Korean Presbyterian Mission, writes us from Pyeng Yang that A. Murata, the preacher mentioned in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is not a Korean, but a Japanese. He is doing an excellent work among the Japanese in Pyeng Yang.

—SECRETARY W. W. PEET, of the American Board, writes from Constantinople: "I am thankful to receive your further contribution from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the Mardin sufferers. I rejoice that you have been able to raise so large a sum of money for the relief of sufferers in Cilicia. The Swiss committee has arranged for the expenditure of nearly $10,000, under the superintendence of Dr. Shepard, in the Baghche, Hassan Beyli, Osmanieh and Kessab regions. We have secured a large contribution from the government for the erection of buildings, and $50,000 of this has been appropriated to Dr. Shepard's region."

—HELEN GERTRUDE RUMSEY, leader of the twilight meeting at Ocean Grove, N. J., was the national evangelist of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union at the annual convention at Nashville, Tenn., in 1907. The sudden death of the young man to whom she was betrothed, several years ago, caused her to devote her life to religious work. Miss Rumsey wears the white ribbon, and is a very effective speaker, especially among women.

—ON SUNDAY, October 3, St. Louis, Mo., will begin a seven-day celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the city. "Church Day," the opening day, will be devoted to a review of the religious development of the city in one hundred years. The religious celebration will be general, including all denominations. The chairmen of the Committee on Church Day are Samuel Cupples and W. J. Kinsella. Commemorative services, with sermons and addresses of historical character, will be held in all of the city's 444 churches. Uniformed organizations, military and fraternal, will proceed in organized bodies from their armories and halls to such churches as they may select. A chorus of thousands of Sunday School pupils will sing appropriate anthems. The downtown section, where once stood churches and residences and now stand great commercial skyscrapers, will be invaded for the day by armies of worshipers, who will unveil tablets marking the sites of the early churches. Centennial week will be the occasion of many notable religious and civic gatherings and family reunions.

The Religion of the Nation

THE new Census of Religions, a comprehensive digest of which appears on another page, deserves to be studied with interest by every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It shows that there has been a steady growth in religion throughout the land, and that the years since the last census was taken, in 1890, have been years of abundant spiritual progress. All along the line, the battalions of Christendom have advanced. Every denomination has shared in this forward movement, and there has been no going backward. There could be no more effective argument than this census with which to meet the claims of those sceptics who have been asserting that religion was declining and materialism spreading among the American people.

The forces of Protestantism in America are thus arrayed:

Protestant	ministers	146,451
"	churches	187,950
"	church membership	20,287,742
"	Sunday Schools	165,128
"	S. S. officers and teachers	1,564,821
"	S. S. scholars	13,018,434

Very little comfort is to be drawn from these official figures by those who have been inveighing against the churches, and declaring the American Christian pulpit out of harmony with the religious spirit of the times. Possibly, too, the strenuous assailants of Christianity who lately filled the atmosphere with the dust of rhetorical bombardment may now be able to see clearly that the old fortress is still unshaken and the old faith as deeply rooted in the hearts of our people as ever.

Sixty-one and six-tenths per cent. of the whole of religious America is Protestant, as against 36.7 Catholic, or a little more than one-half. It must be admitted, however, that the Catholic Church, with its 12,079,142 communicants or members, makes an imposing showing and towers over any individual denomination among the Protestants. The Catholic increase of nearly 6,000,000 communicants since the last census is also surprising; yet it is evident that it is far below what the Catholic leaders themselves expected to report, for their estimate was that the total strength of the church's communicants would be 20,000,000, which the census has cut down nearly one-half. And this reduction would have been even greater had not the Catholic membership reports included all who have been baptized in that faith, even children, while nearly all of the Protestant churches reported only adult membership.

That women form a majority of the members in almost all the Protestant denominations, as well as among the Catholics, is very clearly proved by these returns. The general average is 56.9 per cent. women, 43.1 per cent. men. In the Protestant churches, the feminine preponderance is still more marked, being 60.7, and in some few denominations it rises to 63.5 per cent. These figures bring home, with a new emphasis, the oft-repeated question, "Why don't men go to church?"

That great nursery of the faith, the Sunday School, is, next to the church itself, the chief factor in extending the religion of Jesus Christ. Here the Protestants have the field practically to themselves —nearly eleven times as many schools as the Catholics, twenty-five times as many officers and teachers and nine times as many scholars.

On the whole the census, while doing justice to all the religions represented, makes a showing for Protestant Christianity which should be accepted as an inspiration and an incentive to still more zealous effort for the spread of the free Gospel throughout our land. And it should not be forgotten that the Sunday School is the key to the situation and the most important agent in the problem of continental evangelization.

The Other Side of Harriman

WHILE the press of the country is engaged in reviewing the remarkable career of the poor office boy who became the greatest of America's railroad kings, and devoting entire pages to a recital of his financial exploits, and to speculating as to the disposal of his vast fortune of from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000, there are many who will remember Edward H. Harriman, not as a magnate of boundless wealth, but as a big-hearted American, who loved nothing better than to do good, quietly and unostentatiously. They will recall how he paid the way for hundreds of our penniless consumptives, furnishing them with skilled treatment and a chance for life at an Adirondack health resort; how he took the tenderest care of his old employees, and how he was the secret donor whose gifts brought joy and comfort to many humble homes of poverty. Harking back to the hard struggle of his own boyhood, he built, endowed and equipped a club for boys, which yielded him probably more genuine pleasure than many of his Wall Street conquests.

Readers of this journal, too, will recall how he gladly gave free transportation over the Union and Southern Pacific lines to California for the cargo of flour which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD raised for the relief of the sufferers during the great Chinese famine. Other roads, moved by Mr. Harriman's generous example, also assisted. That gift of free transportation was practically a donation of $15,000, and represented a saving of many lives.

Such was the other side of Harriman—the human side. Long-headed yet big-hearted, considerate of others and losing no opportunity to do a kindness—these are qualities that outweigh all his millions, and they are all the more fragrant now that he has ceased from earthly activities.

The Polar Controversy

COMMANDER PEARY'S message from Indian Harbor to Melville E. Stone, of the Associated Press, New York, has stirred up a hot controversy regarding the respective claims of Dr. Cook and himself as to the discovery of the Pole, which can only be settled by submitting all the facts and records in their possession to a competent scientific tribunal. It is not a dispute that can be adjudicated by the press. To try the merits of the case in the public prints, meanwhile, must prove profitless and inconclusive. The wiser attitude is to accept the claims of both the explorers as made in good faith, and to reserve final judgment for the proof which must sooner or later be forthcoming.

Denmark has already showered honors upon Dr. Cook; he has been decorated and féted in the capital, and the nation's greatest scientists have apparently recognized his claim without hesitation. Belgium has also paid him distinguished homage, and banquets and receptions await him on his arrival here. Commander Peary, whose success seems to be everywhere unquestioned, will also receive the full tribute of public recognition and the reward that is due to his great exploit. This country stands ready to give the highest acknowledgment to the discoverer of the Pole, and it is a public misfortune that the present dispute should have arisen to mar what might otherwise have been regarded as a double national triumph.

If the coming investigation should not prove that both explorers actually attained the goal, it may at least show convincingly that the claims of both were made in good faith. It is conceivable that contingencies might arise during a polar journey that might lead even the most skilful into wrong conclusions. On the other hand, it is also quite within the possibilities that the production of the explorers' journals may happily clear away all misunderstandings. In any event, let us have the facts, and let the whole world know to whom the real honors belong.

Relief Work in Monterey

THERE has not been, for a number of years, such a disaster on our continent as the flood which swept over Monterey and wrecked one-third of the city, besides destroying numerous towns and villages in the valley of the Santa Catarina. Part of the State of Nuevo Leon is yet to be heard from, but what is known of the disaster and the entailed suffering should be sufficient to bring immediate assistance from across the northern border. The governmental relations of Mexico and the United States have become closer than ever before in the last few years, and the present opportunity to show practical interest in the welfare of northern Mexico should be promptly seized by the American people.

There has been, however, some feeling against the United States in Nuevo Leon, the people thinking, perhaps, that we were getting too strong a foothold within their boundaries. According to the most authentic reports, this feeling is being rapidly turned to friendship and gratitude on account of the interest taken by Americans, both in Mexico and at home, in sending succor to the stricken districts. Americans are also helping personally in the relief work, with no other object than to relieve suffering, and this has had a wonderful effect on the Mexican mind. American contributions and kindness are doing more for good international relationship than many treaties of commerce and peace. It is a kind of diplomacy which needs no government commission and in which all can take part. The opportunity should not be neglected. Send your gift to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day.

Our Marvelous Age

SHOULD ghosts come back to Manhattan in the bright days immediately succeeding September 25 they would be very much surprised at the magnificence of the city that, nearly three hundred years ago, was a trading post. During the progress of the centuries, New York has grown at so tremendous a rate of speed that she now takes rank with the most influential commercial centres on the globe.

It seems almost incredible to us, as we link the names of Hudson and Fulton, that the latter demonstrated the feasibility of steam navigation only one hundred and two years ago. To the faith and generosity of Robert Livingston, Fulton owed his ability to launch on the waters of the noble Hudson the little Clermont, with its maximum speed of five miles an hour. Against this background may we not fancy the ghosts rubbing their eyes in wonder if, unseen, they hover over the splendid naval parade on which the city has lavished so much preparation, and which will be so remarkable in its equipment and so beautiful as a fairy-like spectacle? The Clermont proceeded up the river at five miles an hour. The Lusitania has recently crossed the Atlantic, from land to land, in four days. This is the record of a single century. We are living in an age of marvels and are rapidly losing our power of being amazed at anything. We are ready to accept as possible almost any invention that may emanate from a human brain, and the child rocked in the cradle of to-day, to our almost certain belief, will fly like a bird through the upper currents of the air to-morrow.

We have much of which to be proud and much for which to be grateful, but have we not as well some things in life which move us to humility?

Forty Thousand Workmen March

THE weather on Labor Day was perfect, and millions of citizens enjoyed every moment of the holiday. There were labor parades in cities all over the country. In Newark, N. J., 8,000 were in line; in Philadelphia and Cincinnati there were 10,000 in each who marched; and some 50,000 union men were in the San Francisco parade. Perhaps the most notable demonstration of the day was the parade of labor's host in New York City, in which about 45,000 marched down Fifth Avenue from the Plaza at Fifty-ninth Street to Washington Arch. Every conceivable craft was represented by flags and men; at least thirty bands enlivened the footsteps of those who were marching. The procession was graced by many women who, for the first time, took a prominent part in the exercises of the day. Most of them rode in automobiles, converted into chariots, while there were some who trudged shoulder to shoulder with the men in the long march. There were a number of beautifully decorated floats, containing human figures. The eighth one was particularly notable, illustrating the benefits to mankind of the eight-hour day. One of the signs in the women's part of the parade was "Union wages are two billions a year. Women spend seventy per cent. Union wages should be spent for union products." The women's part of the parade was cheered more lustily than all the rest together. In the printer's division a spare man, all alone, bore a strange device, a globe of white flowers on the end of a cane and surmounted by a tiny flag at the top; beneath the orb was a banner on which was the inscription "Dr. Cook was a printer, too." Although a large majority of the rich residents of Fifth Avenue were out in the country on their vacations, still there were hundreds of thousands of citizens who lined the pavements on each side of the street, and the magnificent outpouring of the ranks of labor and their orderly demonstration profoundly impressed the observers and the whole city, as its record has doubtless attracted the attention of the country at large. Such peaceful demonstrations add to the dignity and glory of labor. The artisans and their families number 20,000,000 in this country, and the farmers and their families probably number about 20,000,000 more.

The Labor Parade, 40,000 Strong, Passing Down Fifth Avenue, New York

Such hardy workmen have made, and are producing, our wealth. It is a fortunate thing for the nation that the irritations and frictions caused between capital and labor are being adjusted more and more by prudence and principle rather than by prejudice and passion. An unusual feature of this largest labor parade ever held in New York was that there were only two feeble strikes on in New York City, which will doubtless be adjusted satisfactorily. Honest, intelligent labor is God's law and man's blessing.

Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening. (Ps. 104:23.)

The Cat a Pest

The Department of Agriculture in the United States is very close to the common people. It seeks to eliminate impurity in food and drink; tells the farmers the insects that ought to be cultivated and those that ought to be killed; sends seeds of all kinds to the farmers; and now it has issued a note of warning against the ordinary cat. Its criticisms against this well-nigh universally cherished domestic animal are bitter, and the reasons for its hostility are plainly stated. The department claims that the reported destruction of rats by the feline species has been greatly exaggerated and that their slaughter of millions of useful wild birds every year has been overlooked. It charges that the cat is liable to transmit certain diseases to children and grown people, and that it should be removed by the wholesale as a pest. Cats multiply in the large cities with such marvelous rapidity that, besides their taking off by the wheels of carts, automobiles and trolley cars, by vicious dogs and bad small boys, thousands are removed every year by societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

While the Department of Agriculture is near to the heart of the people, it will require evidence of its statements to back up its abuse of the domestic pet before pussy will be taken from the arms of children or their parents, and chloroformed or drowned.

It is likely that the Babylonians got their cats originally from Egypt, where a person could be put to death for killing one. The Egyptians worshiped them as gods, holding each individual as sacred and embalming it after death; and yet it is a singular fact that the domestic cat is not mentioned by name in the canonical Scriptures. The nearest approach to any such reference is found in Isaiah, of an animal which many scholars think answers to the wildcat or even to the domesticated cat.

And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses. (Isa. 13:22.)

Kept Souls in Their Bodies

Captain "Bill" McMahon, of the United States Volunteer Life Saving Corps, has just died from pneumonia contracted in the discharge of duty. Although only twenty-six years of age, he had the brilliant record of having rescued seventy-three persons from a watery grave. If by his personal bravery he had picked off seventy-three soldiers from the enemy's ranks with his rifle, history would have recorded him among the great heroes; but because he saved seventy-three his fame is confined to a stickful or two in the daily papers. Yet he is embalmed in the hearts of thousands of people on the East Side in New York, to whose homes he brought joy, and is cherished in the heart of his heavenly Father, who prompted him to such unselfish service for others. He repeatedly said that the passion of his life was to keep souls in bodies. To what a divine call did this man respond! What if every Christian were to have as burning a passion for keeping life in human souls as "Bill" McMahon had for keeping souls in bodies! How quickly would the world be converted to God and what rich rewards would come to those engaged in the work of soul-saving!

Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. (James 5 : 20.)

Bread by New Process

A machine has just been invented which crushes the grains of wheat, kneads the product into dough and turns it out into loaves. The machine can be made small enough for a woman to use in her kitchen, for a private family, or large enough to accommodate itself to the largest output and strongest power. The process was invented by two Frenchmen, Messrs. Desgoffe and Georges. This machine is called a panificator. It consists of a large screw turning loosely in a case, on whose inner surface is also a screw-thread running in the opposite direction. Between the main threads on the cylinder are smaller threads, and the depth of the groove between the main thread grows smaller from one end to the other, so that it will hold the entire wheat grain as it enters the machine, but at the exit will accommodate only the pulverized wheat. "The wheat is washed in much water to remove impurities, after which it is poured into another receptacle. A pint of water to a pound of wheat and a quantity of yeast and salt is added. Thus prepared the wheat is poured into the funnel of the panificator, whence it penetrates automatically into the body of the machine, passing through a distributor. From the distributor the wheat falls between the threads of the two screws, which crush the envelope and the body of the grain, making of them a homogeneous mixture which, just before leaving the machine, forms a smooth paste, but the work of kneading is terminated by the operation of a glider formed by two parallel surfaces. To prevent all heating of the mass during the work a current of water is sent through the interior of the machine. The dough on issuing from the machine is put into baskets, covered with woolen cloths, and allowed to stand in a warm place until it begins to rise, when it is divided into long loaves, put into the oven and baked forty or forty-five minutes."

Some scientists believe that this new process is valuable and comparatively inexpensive and will be widely adopted. It will doubtless prompt the protest and opposition of the flour-makers. A good feature of the invention is the retention of the whole wheat in the compound. There is not much doubt but that Providence made the flint of the grain for man's use, and it is a grave question whether the bolting-cloth of the modern flouring mill is not one of the enemies to the health of the human race. Man is the only animal that makes his own clothing and prepares and cooks his own food. Even by so simple a process as that of Messrs. Desgoffe and Georges much energy and intelligent mechanism are required before the dough is ready for food.

Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread. (Prov. 20:13.)

Crew Slain and Eaten

A telegram from Sidney, N. S. W., the other day gave the news of a dreadful tragedy in the New Hebrides. Captain Lindsay, master of the ketch Rabaul, was first thrust through by a spear and then clubbed to death by a horde of savages. The crew, numbering ten, was massacred and the vessel, seized by the savages, was burned at Mallicallo, New Hebrides. The people in this place are still cannibals, and it is believed that the captain and his crew were devoured by them.

Missionary history furnishes no record of a truer heroism than that exhibited in the conversion of many of the inhabitants of these islands of the Pacific, whose peoples furnish an illustration of a splendid civilization and type of the Christian religion, but there have always been savage districts, containing cannibal tribes, which have resisted the message and minister of the Gospel; and, like these that destroyed and devoured the captain and his crew, have met the warmest love with the most diobolical hate. The tragedy of the New Hebrides is a rare exception, as Christianity has driven cannibalism almost from the face of the earth. And these benighted districts of heathenism and barbarism will soon accept Christ's light and love.

Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God. (Ps. 53:4.)

OUR NEW CENSUS OF RELIGIONS

Government Statistics which Show that Christianity is Gaining Ground Throughout the Nation

THE Census Bureau of the United States Government has just issued its latest report, the contents of which are of universal interest. For the general information of our readers we give an abstract of this voluminous document, the full text of which fills ninety-one closely printed pages. These statistics are compiled from returns received from individual church organizations, obtained partly by correspondence and partly through special agents.

One hundred and eighty-six religious denominations are represented in this census, of which 48 are new since the last census in 1890. The 22 leading religious bodies are placed first on the list in order of numerical strength, the Protestant bodies leading, followed by the Catholic Church, Jewish congregations, Latter-day Saints, Eastern Orthodox churches and others. The census report proceeds:

"Of the 212,230 organizations in 1906, 195,618, or 92.2 per cent., are reported by the 164 Protestant bodies; 12,482, or 5.9 per cent., by the Roman Catholic Church; and 4,130, or about 2 per cent., by the remaining bodies, including Jewish congregations, Latter-day Saints, Eastern Orthodox churches, and 14 other minor bodies. Between 1890 and 1906 the total number of religious organizations in the United States increased 47,079, or 28.5 per cent. For Protestant bodies the increase was 42,564, or 27.8 per cent.; for the Roman Catholic Church 2,243, or 21.9 per cent.; for Jewish congregations 1,236, or 231.9 per cent.; and for Latter-day Saints 328, or 38.3 per cent.

How the Denominations Stand

"The Methodist bodies rank first in number of organizations, in 1906 reporting 64,701, or 30.5 per cent. of the entire number in the United States. The Baptist bodies rank second, with 54,880 organizations, or 25.9 per cent. of the whole number. Six other Protestant denominations comprise from 2 to more than 7 per cent. of all the organizations in 1906, namely, Presbyterian bodies with 15,506 organizations, or 7.3 per cent. of the total number; Lutheran bodies with 12,703, or 6 per cent.; Disciples, or Christians, with 10,942, or 5.2 per cent.; Protestant Episcopal Church with 6,845, or 3.2 per cent.; Congregationalists with 5,713, or 2.7 per cent.; and United Brethren bodies with 4,304, or 2 per cent. These 6, together with the Methodist and Baptist families, comprise 71 bodies, which represent substantially nine-tenths of the Protestant organizations and 82.8 per cent. of all the religious organizations in the United States."

Of the larger Protestant bodies only three show a decline, viz., the Christians (Christian Connection), 3.2 per cent. loss; United Brethren, 4.9 per cent. loss; Universalists, 11.5 per cent. loss. The Jewish congregations have grown from 533 organizations in 1890 to 1,769 organizations to-day. The Adventists have risen from 995 organizations in 1890 to 1,189; the Baptists have a great gain of 11,971 organizations since the last census; the Primitive Baptists, 612 organizations increase; Free Will Baptists, 441; Northern Baptists, 370. The Christian Science Church has had a rapid growth, from 221 organizations in 1890 to 638, a gain of 188.7 per cent. The Lutherans have increased from 8,595 to 12,703, or 47.8 per cent.; the Methodists (including all organizations of the Methodist Church) have added 13,212 organizations in the same period; the Presbyterians report an increase of 2,035 organizations, which includes the growth of both of the large wings of the Presbyterian Church. The number of churches reported by all the religious denominations has increased 47,079 since 1890.

Protestant and Catholic Strength Contrasted

We quote from the census: "The whole number of communicants, or members, reported by all the religious bodies was 32,936,445, of which 20,287,742, or 61.6 per cent., were returned by the 164 Protestant bodies; 12,079,142, or 36.7 per cent., by the Roman Catholic Church; and 569,561, or 1.7 per cent., by 21 other bodies. Of the 20,597,954 communicants, or members, given in the report for 1890, the Protestant bodies contributed 14,007,187, or 68 per cent.; the Roman Catholic Church 6,241,708, or 30.3 per cent.; and all the remaining bodies 349,059, or 1.7 per cent. The membership of the Protestant bodies has increased 6,280,555, or 44.8 per cent., while the membership of the Roman Catholic Church has increased 5,837,434, or 93.5 per cent. In view of the great volume of immigration to this country since 1890 the increase of 93.5 per cent. for the Roman Catholic Church does not seem to be greater than would naturally be expected."

The census points out the fact that in all Protestant bodies the reports of membership deal essentially with adults, although it may include those as young as 12 or 15 years. In the Roman Catholic Church all baptized persons are included, even infants; but 15 per cent. of the number of Catholics reported has been deducted to cover those under 9 years of age. Practically the same method has been applied in dealing with the Armenian, Eastern Orthodox and Polish National churches. In the Jewish churches, only heads of families (sometimes including females) are reported. The following table shows the standing of the denominations:

DENOMINATION	COMMUNICANTS OR MEMBERS, 1906	INCREASE OVER 1890
Roman Catholic Church	12,079,142	5,837,434
Methodist bodies	5,749,838	1,160,554
Baptist bodies	5,662,234	1,949,766
Lutheran bodies	2,112,494	881,422
Presbyterian bodies	1,830,555	552,704

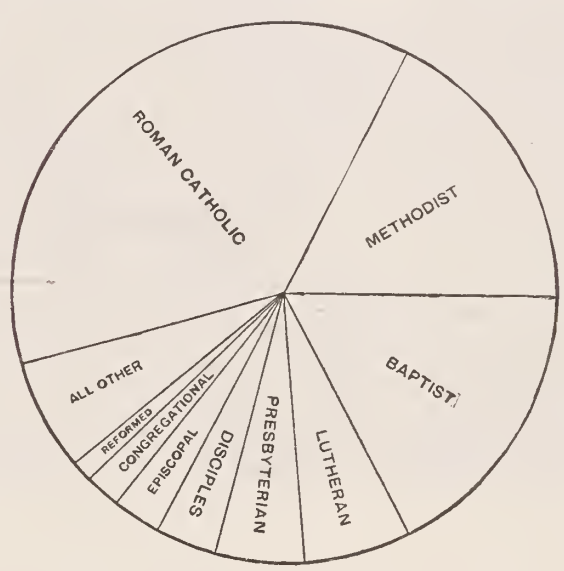
Adventist bodies	92,735	32,244
Church of Christ, Scientist	85,717	76,993
Independent churches	73,673	60,313
Unitarians	70,542	2,793
Universalists	64,158	14,964
Mennonite bodies	54,798	13,257

Among Protestants, the Methodist bodies rank first in number of members, with 5,749,838, or 17.5 per cent. of the total, and the Baptist bodies come next, with 5,662,234 members, or 17.2 per cent. These 2 families together constitute somewhat more than one-third of the entire Protestant membership of the country. If to these be added the Lutheran bodies with 2,112,494 members, the Presbyterian bodies with 1,830,555 members, the Disciples (or Christians) with 1,142,359 members—each containing more than a million members—the 5 bodies combined include 16,497,480 members, or fully one-half



Comparative Standing of Religious Bodies in U.S., 1906

(50.2 per cent.) of the membership of all religious bodies in the United States and more than four-fifths (81.3 per cent.) of all Protestant bodies.

The Catholic Church reported the highest number of communicants or members per organization, 969; Eastern Orthodox churches, 315; German Evangelical synod, 245, and the Protestant bodies, as a whole, 104, the latter being less than one-ninth the average number for the Catholic Church.

Women Outnumber Men in the Churches

In almost all the reports it is shown that the women outnumber the men in church attachment, an average of 56.9 per cent. of the members or communicants being females, as against 43.1 per cent. of the opposite sex. This is notably the case in the Protestant Church, where 60.7 per cent. are females. In the Catholic Church the preponderance is very slight, being only .7 per cent. In the Oriental churches the percentage of males largely preponderates. Among some of the Presbyterian bodies the percentage of male members is only 36.5, while in others it rises to 46.5 per cent. In the Congregationalist bodies it is 34.1 per cent. Among the Christian Scientists it is smallest, 27.6 per cent.

The total number of religious organizations reporting in the census is 212,230, of which 199,831 report as to places of worship. The Methodists report 59,990 places of worship, the Baptists 50,092, the Presbyterians 15,311, the Lutherans 11,194, the Catholics 11,881. A number of the smaller bodies report the use of halls, instead of regular churches. The Methodists and Baptists together own 57.1 per cent., or more than half of the church buildings reported; the Presbyterians 7.9 per cent., Roman Catholics 6.2 per cent., Lutherans 5.8 per cent., Disciples 4.7 per cent., Protestant Episcopal 3.6 per cent., and Congregationalists 3 per cent. The largest increase in the number of church buildings since the last census has been among the Methodists, who have built 13,852 new buildings, Baptists 12,421, and the others in diminishing ratio.

The seating capacity of all the Protestant churches is 53,282,445, which is far above the membership, while the Catholic churches seat only 4,494,377, which is much lower than the membership. Protestant bodies own $935,942,578 in buildings and equipment, Catholics own $292,638,787, and all other denominations own $28,994,502. Church indebtedness is also reported as follows: Protestants $53,301,254, Catholics $49,488,055, Jews $4,556,571, all others $705,066.

Our Sunday School Army

An interesting part of the census deals with the Sunday Schools. In all, 192,000 Sunday Schools were reported, with 1,746,074 officers and teachers, and a great army of 15,337,811 scholars. These figures do not include the mission Sunday Schools maintained by some churches. Moreover, 14,508 of the schools reported are undenominational and union, therefore unattached to any particular church. Of the whole number, 165,128 Sunday Schools belong to Protestant churches and 11,172 to Catholic churches. The Methodists come first with 57,464 Sunday Schools, Baptists next with 43,178, Presbyterians 14,452, Lutherans 9,450, Disciples 8,078; these five denominations having more than four-fifths of all the Protestant Sunday Schools and nearly three-fourths of the total number. The Protestant bodies have 1,564,821 officers and teachers, the Catholic Church 62,470 officers and teachers; the Protestants have 13,018,434 scholars, Catholics 1,481,535 scholars. The Methodists come first denominationally, with 4,472,930 scholars, Baptists 2,898,914 scholars, Presbyterians 1,511,175 scholars, Congregationalists 638,089 scholars, Disciples 634,504 scholars, Lutherans 782,786, Jews 130,085.

The census of the ministry shows a total for all denominations of 164,830 ministers, an increase of 53,794 since the last census. Of these 146,451 are Protestant, 15,177 Catholic, and 3,202 represent other bodies. The Baptists lead the Protestant list with 43,790 ministers, Methodists 39,737, Presbyterians 12,456, Disciples 8,741, Lutherans 7,841. The Protestant ministry increased 47 per cent. since the last census, the Catholic 65 per cent. The Christian Scientists have 1,276 ministers as against 26 in 1890.

In 29 States a majority of the church members or communicants are Protestants; in 16 States the Catholics have a majority, and in one State the Latter-day Saints. The States where the Catholic communicants outnumber the Protestants are New Mexico, Rhode Island, Montana, Massachusetts, Nevada, Arizona, New York, New Hampshire, Louisiana, Connecticut, California, Vermont, Maine, New Jersey, Wisconsin, Michigan. This preponderance, however, is more apparent than real, for the reason that, as already explained, the Catholic returns take in all who have been baptized, including even children, whereas the Protestant returns deal with none under 12 or 15 years. In Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Virginia and South Carolina a majority of the communicants are Baptists; while the Methodists hold a majority in Delaware, the Lutherans in North Dakota, the Disciples in Kentucky, Congregationalists in Vermont and Episcopalians in the District of Columbia. The net increase since the last census among the Protestant bodies has been 1.8 per cent., among the Catholics 4.4 per cent., and all others one-tenth of one per cent.

The colored churches are represented by 36,563 organizations, with 3,685,097 communicants or members, 62.5 per cent. being women. They have 35,160 churches, church property worth $56,636,159, with an indebtedness of $5,005,905. They have 34,681 Sunday Schools, with 1,740,099 scholars.

There is certainly nothing in the figures quoted in this latest religious census to substantiate the opinion expressed by critics of Christianity that the religion of Christ is losing ground. A certain class of theologians, who have endeavored to show that such is the case, will find an absolute refutation in these figures, which demonstrate clearly that every religious denomination, Protestant and Catholic, has progressed; that the Gospel is being more widely preached, that the country is more strongly Christian and our people more numerously and zealously attached to the Christian Church than at any previous time in our country's history.

BREAD UPON THE WATERS

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

As far as the eye could see the world was beautiful in amber, crimson and gold. The trees were gay in their autumn dress, and the fields, resting in the soft October sunshine, had the air of tranquillity that befits nature when the harvests are ingathered and the summer's work is done. Mrs. Woolner came to her door, shading her eyes with her hand as she looked down the long, level road. She was watching for the return of her daughter Edith, who had spent the day in town. Presently Edith appeared at the corner of the road, but to her mother's surprise she was not alone. She was leading a little child. Mrs. Woolner thought at first that Edith had brought Cousin Sarah's Jenny or Cousin Marion's Tom to enjoy a week in the country, but as the two advanced nearer and reached the gate she discovered that this little stranger was not of her kindred. The child was thin, pale and poorly clothed. Her age was anywhere from seven to ten. She looked hungry, or rather starved, as if she had not had enough to eat, and she clung to Edith's hand as if she dreaded the inspection of the lady in the doorway.

"Who in the world is this, Edith?" cried the mother, in an accent half reproachful and half indignant. She felt like adding what was in her mind, "Where did you pick up this little scarecrow?" but she refrained from saying anything so uncivil. Mrs. Woolner was unlike Edith in one particular, although they had many things in common. She had never accepted Edith's views about the poor. If she could assist a poor family by a timely gift of money or of clothing she was willing to deny herself that she might render aid, but when it was a matter of seating a pauper at her table or letting a waif sleep in one of her clean white beds she was aware of an inward protest. "Edith," Mrs. Woolner often said, "was too soft-hearted and sentimental for a world like ours, where there must be caste lines and definite places for different people."

"Mother," said Edith, as she lifted her face and kissed her mother's lips in reply to the question Mrs. Woolner had asked, "this is a little friend of mine. Her name is Jessie. She hasn't any home, and nobody can find her father, who has gone away across the great sea. Jessie's father is coming back some day, and when he comes I want him to find a little daughter whom he will be glad to see; a rosy, dimpled little Jessie. Come in, darling. You are going to stay here with me, and be quite safe."

Edith's vocation most of the year was that of a free kindergartner. With her the work was a continual joy. The poorer, the more forlorn, the more desolate her charges were the stronger was the appeal they made to her overflowing kindness of heart. While at college Edith had studied sociology and had determined to make her life tell in practical helpfulness to the Lord's poor. She visited among the families of her children, and was acquainted with all their affairs. Her mother had some time ago decided that Edith must be allowed to carry out her own ideas without too much interference on her part. The daughter not only earned her own money, but was in possession of a small income, which had come to her as a legacy from the great-aunt whose name she bore. Edith would have been happier had her mother sympathized with her more deeply, but she tried her best never to let her actions disturb her mother's convenience or comfort. Never before had she ventured to introduce any one into the house without securing her mother's consent. Still she knew she could confidently rest on her mother's love.

Edith Woolner conducted little Jessie to her own room. It was a great room on the second floor of the house, that had four windows, two of which looked out upon a garden still bright with asters and chrysanthemums. The child ran to one of the windows and clasped her hands in ecstasy. "Oh, so many, many flowers!" she said. "I have never seen so many!"

"To-morrow," Edith answered, "you shall go to walk with me, and you shall gather all the flowers you can carry, armfuls of them if you choose. Now, dear, you are tired, and I must give you a bath and then you shall have supper and go to bed. You shall sleep here in my room, on this lounge, and I think you will have happy dreams."

"The lady," said Jessie, "is sorry that I have come." Her dark eyes filled with tears. She was one of those children whose eyes seem to occupy so much of the countenance that other features pass unnoticed. Nobody would have thought Jessie pretty as she stood beside Edith that evening, yet an artist would have seen that there were possibilities of uncommon beauty in the pallid little face.

"The lady is going to love you, dear," said Edith, as she went on with her arrangements for the comfort of her little guest.

When mother and daughter were alone Edith explained that this child had been brought to her kindergarten in the closing weeks of the summer by a neighbor, who had taken the child in out of pity. Jessie was an American, and this in itself was a distinction where nearly all the children in the school were Italians or Hungarians. The neighbor said that Jessie's mother had died of fever and that her father, a musician, who had been devoted to his wife and little girl and had formerly earned enough to keep them from want, had mysteriously disappeared. He had gone out and had not returned. After his wife's death, the neighbor had explained, Mr. Vernon was not right in his head. There was a report or rumor that he had joined a traveling company and had gone far away. At all events, the neighbor had taken Jessie in, the poor being kind to one another to a degree beyond the kindness of the rich.

Edith said that the child had been much on her mind. She knew that the O'Harras had several children of their own, and that the summer was an especially difficult time for them, much more difficult than the winter, for in the latter season the people for whom Mrs. O'Harra worked were at home, while in the former they were in Maine or the Adirondacks or abroad. She had felt that they ought to be relieved of the additional burden made by one more mouth to fill, and she had gone to see them in the hope that she might offer them help. "Then, mother dear," she added, "I saw that there was nothing to be done but to bring little Jessie here and take care of her until that poor wandering father gets back to New York."

"Edith," said Mrs. Woolner, "I can't imagine why you have the slightest anticipation of that father's ever coming back. Why did you tell Jessie that he had gone across the sea?"

"I heard something to-day that made me think that John Vernon had shipped before the mast. He could play the violin, the neighbors all said, and he was a man of some education, as I discovered by looking at the books he had left behind him, books which Mrs. O'Harra has preserved. In his boyhood, I learned, he had been a sailor, and there is a sort of floating tradition in the tenement that he belongs to a good family and that his people have cast him off. Jessie is a little thoroughbred. You will notice that when you are better acquainted with her. Whether or not her father finds her again, I mean to do all I can to care for her and bring her up in the right way. There is room enough in this big house for this one little lost lamb."

Mrs. Woolner smiled and sighed. "Your father would approve of you, Edith, if he were living. He used to do exactly such quixotic things. Don't bring any more little strangers into the house, and I'll try to think the best I can of this one."

Months and years slipped away. Jessie Vernon had grown to be a tall and very beautiful girl in her eighteenth summer. Edith had in a sense adopted her, and to Mrs. Woolner and the circle of kindred and friends she had become a source of pleasure and was regarded as one of the family. The Woolners decided this year to close their house and spend a year in Italy. Of course Jessie accompanied them. On shipboard she attracted the attention of an elderly couple who were crossing, and who told Mrs. Woolner that for years they had spent very little time in America. "Your younger daughter," said the old gentlewoman, whose eyes constantly sought Jessie, "is the image of a daughter whom we lost a long time ago. She made an unfortunate marriage, and we were mistaken in our treatment of her and of her husband. I can hardly tell you how deep was our heartbreak when at last we traced her, only to find a grave in an obscure corner of a cemetery near New York. Twelve months ago, after a long search, we found her husband. He was ill and we ministered to him, fearing for a long time that he would die. Perhaps he might better have died, for he has gone through much hardship and his memory is sorely impaired. The one thing he still can do is to play on the violin that he loves, and that my husband and I used to loathe. John Vernon is at our home in Connecticut now. Our children at home are caring for him and we are trying to find, if we can, the little daughter whom he left behind when in desperation he took a ship and went he knew not where. I think if we could find her again it would prove his restoration, and it would make us utterly happy and blessed in the evening of our lives."

When Mrs. Woolner and Edith were by themselves this conversation was repeated in detail, the mother reluctant by this time to believe that she must give up the adopted child, who had crept into her heart. She said to Edith that the resemblance might be a coincidence; that the story was, after all, commonplace in the occurrences of a great city, and that even the name, John Vernon, might mean nothing so far as their Jessie was concerned. Edith shook her head. The O'Harras had given her the few articles that had belonged to Jessie's mother—only a garment or two, and an old-fashioned brooch

An Eventful Southern Exploring Tour

RETURNING from a trip to the interior of a practically unexplored section of South America, a traveler has just enriched the Commercial Museum in Philadelphia with a number of interesting trophies. The trip was made to the rubber region of South America by Mr. Louis Weiss, who probably knows more about the region referred to than any other white man living, and who speaks the language of the natives. His explorations led Mr. Weiss to the headwaters of the Rio Negro, in far northwestern Brazil and southeastern Colombia. He has brought back with him examples of native pottery and clothing, basketwork of all kinds, whistles made of deer skulls, flutes from the bones of the tapir, hog deer and monkey, and percussion instruments of various kinds.

One of his curios Mr. Weiss calls the first attempt at wireless telegraphy. It is a hollowed-out portion of a tree trunk, swung on strands of fibre, so as to admit of its vibration. When struck with a hammer it gives forth a dull, penetrating sound, which can be heard from twenty-five to thirty miles. The natives use this instrument to communicate with each other, a code having been established among the tribes.

On Mr. Weiss' latest trip he spent about eighteen months journeying along the river and visiting the Indian tribes. Starting from Manaos, which is 1,000 miles up the Amazon, he went by steamer to Santa Isabel and thence to San Felipe, where he made his headquarters. The trip was made to San Felipe in a small boat, and occupied twenty-six days. Much of the time was spent in portages, or in poling the boat through the many rapids. After two weeks, they reached an Indian village, and from this point Mr. Weiss and his native followers were entirely on their own resources. For fourteen months the exploring party practically lived in canoes, traveling thousands of miles. They encountered 191 waterfalls, where the canoes had to be carried overland, sometimes for a distance of 12 miles.

The Explorer and His Party En Route

In order to pay their way in a country where money is unknown, about 4,000 pounds of bright red calico were distributed. In addition to this calico, the expedition carried 700 pounds of gunpowder, 1,000 pounds of lead shot, 300 pounds of knives, axes and similar hardware, 40,000 fishing hooks, 1,000 looking-glasses, 200 pounds of glass beads, 3,000 brass buttons, and a variety of other things, most of which were bartered for native curios. Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

W. J. H., Adrian, Wash. What proceedings should an heir take to find out if an estate be left, and what should he do to claim same if left in Germany?

If applicant conjectures that he is interested in an estate in some particular country, or in a region near some particular city, he can write to the nearest American Consul, or to the American Ambassador at Berlin, for information. It is indispensable to designate accurately the place where the estate is supposed to be. Then address the nearest Consul.

T. H. C., Plainfield, N. J. What is Christian enthusiasm? Many nowadays define it academically, i. e., en, Theos.

There is an allowable latitude in such definitions. Christian enthusiasm is variously manifested in different people. It is the zeal that inspires the heart to loyal Christian service; the devotion that is ready to make any sacrifice for Jesus' sake; the passion for soul-winning and the spread of the kingdom; the rapture and exaltation that come to some intense natures; while in others it takes the form of a great and commendable devotion, none the less real and precious because less demonstrative. In all cases, whether in the individual or the mass, it is the warm, generous glow kindled in the heart by the Holy Spirit, working in us and through us and filling us with joy and courage. See Paul's fine illustration of Christian enthusiasm in Phil. 3:7-21.

A. McK., Newport, R. I. 1. Are the water particles in the clouds ever frozen as they float in the air? 2. Into how many classes are clouds divided?

1. Yes; the water particles are often frozen. 2. Luke Howard, in 1803, published a classification of clouds, which has generally been accepted. 2. He divides them into three primary forms—cirrus, stratus and cumulus—and a compound of the foregoing, the black rain cloud or nimbus.

Mrs. C. C., Denison, Tex. What is the law in Texas in regard to the disposition of a man's real estate and personal property after death, when leaving children by his first wife and none by his second wife? Does his widow get anything?

Widow takes one-third of the personal property absolutely (after payment of husband's debts), and has the right to use one-third of the real estate during her life. She may use the homestead while she lives.

D. B., Santa Anna, Tex. Please explain the clause in the Lord's Prayer "Lead us not into temptation."

The clearer translation is "Let us not be drawn into temptation." It is an appeal by the petitioner, conscious of his own weakness, to be protected from those situations and conditions that lead him to sin. Temptation is a part of Christian discipline in this world, but we have a right to ask for divine strength to enable us to resist it. See James 1:13, 14; Matt. 26:41, and I. Cor. 10:13.

Mrs. R. L. B., Dolington, Pa. How is a religious life influenced by education?

Much must depend on temperament. In many cases—probably in a majority—education deepens, strengthens and develops spiritual character; in others, it seems to operate detrimentally. Progress in the spiritual life, while it can be materially assisted by education, is not dependent upon it. Some of the most spiritual-minded persons we have ever met were simple souls, who made God's Word their library and had little claim to culture.

J. A. B., Little Rock, Ark. 1. Do you think the time will ever come in this country when all races, without regard to color and without any so-called "social" pretense, will become mutually interested in each other's welfare? 2. Is our religious progress real and genuine, so long as this state of things does not come about?

1. While the tendency is toward social and race betterment and more mutually helpful relations, the ideal state probably will not be reached until the millennium. Nothing less than divine power, in its widest operation, can bring about complete social regeneration, although even to-day we find illustrations of practical improvement on a limited scale. 2. Human life is a great school and every age witnesses some advance. We progress slowly; we must not expect to reach perfection, but must keep on striving. The progress is genuine, however small the results. In God's good time the transformation will be complete, but not before. This applies to your last question also.

Joseph Smith, Nolensville, Tenn. 1. Please give the flower emblematic of each State. 2. When does the sun cross the equator?

1. So-called "State flowers" have been adopted in thirty-two States, generally by the vote of the public school pupils. In Iowa and Maine the Legislature has decided it. The list is as follows: Alabama, golden rod; Arkansas, apple blossom; California, California poppy; Colorado, columbine; Connectient, mountain laurel; Delaware, peach blossom; Idaho, syringa; Illinois, violet; Indiana, corn; Iowa, wild rose; Kansas, sunflower; Louisiana, magnolia; Maine, pine cone and tassel; Maryland, golden rod; Michigan, apple blossom; Minnesota, moccasin; Mississippi, magnolia; Missouri, golden rod; Montana, bitter root; Nebraska, golden rod; New York, rose; North Dakota, wild rose; Ohio, carnation; Oklahoma, crimson rambler; Oregon, golden rod; Rhode Island, violet; South Dakota, anemone; Texas, blue bonnet; Utah, sego lily; Vermont, red clover; Washington, rnododendron; West Virginia, rhododendron. 2. About March 21 and September 22.

A Baptism in the Bush, South Africa

In their work among the natives in the interior of Africa, missionaries encounter many obstacles and have strange experiences. It is not an uncommon thing to hold a preaching service in the open, among the long, weedy grass and without the friendly shelter of a single tree. In the photograph above, the missionary is seen baptizing a native convert in a pool in the sandy veldt, far from any running stream. The photograph was forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. A. Anderson, of the Scandinavian I. B. Mission, Vrijheid, Natal.

E. P., Bridgewater, Vt. Am I justified in asking a professor of religion to lead in devotions who does not believe that Jesus is the Son of God?

You might ask him to join you, but he could not lead, for obvious reasons.

Several readers have written us dissenting from the views and conclusions expressed in the recent letter by Rev. W. P. George (since deceased) on the question of the foundation of the Anglican Church. These correspondents take the ground that the Christian Church was in Britain as early as the second century. K. E. S., Parkersburg, W. Va., writes:

"In the Diocletian persecution, in 303 A.D., St. Alban was the first martyr. Three English bishops of the primitive church attended the council at Arles, France, in 314. The church also had representatives at Nice; while, over one hundred years before St. Augustine went to Britain, that country had been represented at three Ecumenical Councils, proving that that church was known and recognized in the world. St. Augustine went to convert the Saxons in 597, almost the seventh century, the Saxons having been there since 449, fighting the Christian Church, as they were heathens. When St. Augustine reached Britain he was received by seven bishops of the English Church as a friend and brother, but not as a superior. (See Bede's Ecclesiastical History.) St. Augustine converted many of the heathen Saxons, but it was centuries after before the Pope of Rome gained supremacy in England; so the Anglican Church can prove her descent from the primitive British Church and not from Rome."

Of course Dr. George's views were his own, as his signature attested. A paper does not necessarily hold the identical views of its correspondents.

C. P. W., Kingsley, Mich. 1. When was the first cable laid across the Atlantic? 2. Who was Ussher?

1. Several attempts were made to lay an electric cable before the first successful one was completed, August 5, 1858. It was 2,050 miles long, and extended from Valentia, in Ireland, to Newfoundland. Communication was broken later. In 1866 the Great Eastern laid another one, which was successful. 2. Probably you refer to Arehbishop James Ussher. He was an Irish divine, born in Dublin in 1581. He became professor of divinity at Dublin, and in 1621 he was made Bishop of Meath, and in 1625 Archbishop of Armagh. He went to England in 1640, and took part in the theological controversies of the time. He died in 1656, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He is chiefly known as the one who first attempted to compile a Biblical chronology. The dates given in the margin of the Bible are Ussher's.

G. A., Memphis, Tenn. I read in Ps. 137:9, "Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." Please explain.

It was an appeal for vengeance against Israel's oppressors and a foreshadowing of the doom of Babylon, which was to be served as it had served Jerusalem. God did "remember" both Edom and Babylon, to their destruction. The same cruel deeds that were done in Jerusalem were repeated in Babylon, where (according to Prideaux) the women and children were strangled to make the provisions last.

J. A. F., Kingston, Jamaica. It is claimed by some that the original Cleopatra's Needle is now located in New York; by others, that it is in London. Which is correct?

There are two, of equal age. London has one of the needles, New York the other. The obelisks known as "Cleopatra's Needles" were erected by Thothmes III., at Heliopolis, in 1500 B.C., so the designation Cleopatra is a misnomer. One was moved to Alexandria by Augustus in 23 B.C. It was acquired by Great Britain in 1801, but not removed. It was again offered to Great Britain in 1877, and erected on the Thames embankment in 1878. The other Cleopatra's Needle, of the same date, was removed to Alexandria 23 B.C., and offered to the United States in 1877. It was set up in New York in 1881.

Mrs. L. M., Beatrice, Neb. I have often wondered if Dr. Klopsch realizes how, even though Mont-Lawn so blesses the children, that is, after all, not even half the blessing of it. I often send my little contribution through other names. In trying to draw some neglected boys to Sunday School this summer I utterly failed. Later, I took the little Mont-Lawn booklets sent me and told them all about Mont-Lawn, and of the great city and of the children's needs. I showed them the pictures, and finally read them the booklet through. The idea of Christian service reached their souls. I knew they had nothing to give. I had anticipated, by hiring them to do little things and paying them, and they made up 25 cents, which I sent in the name of Master Earl Newton. Now they go to Sunday School. Mont-Lawn saved them.

This is only one of many such letters we are constantly receiving about our Children's Home, showing how widespread and deep is the influence of this beautiful work among the children of the poor. We are not surprised that little folks in other States should be interested in the Children's Paradise and try to help some little tenement waif to enjoy an outing there.

Miscellaneous

Miss I. H. D., Oyster Bay, N. Y. Nothing further is known about them.

A. M. R., New York. Send your question to the Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

M. A. F., Muskoka, Ontario. The Bibles are very nearly alike, the differences being trifling. Both are from the same sources.

C. B. According to the census of 1900, there were 39,059,242 (51.2 per cent.) men and 37,244,145 (48.8 per cent.) women in the United States.

Reader, Henry, Va. 1. The praetical use of the aeroplane has not yet been demonstrated, but it will probably be utilized for military observation or for Weather Bureau purposes. 2. Yes, Catholics believe in Christ as Saviour.

I. W. B., New York City. Nothing now existing on the subject. It may be that among the many books exeluded from the New Testament Canon some of these post-resurrection discourses were referred to. None of the originals are in existence now.

Anxious Inquirer, Adrian, Mich. 1. It means that the three constitute one spiritual government, although the work and office of each is distinct from that of the other. 2. We should pray to the Father and make our petitions in Jesus' name, as he directed.

A. L. D., New York. He was probably wrong; at all events we see very little signs of the millennium having dawned up to the present time. Students of prophecy believe we live in the last period of an important age, but we would advise you to distrust any one who assumes to fix times and dates for prophetic events. Experience has shown that they are invariably wrong, and that no human being knows the divine purposes clearly enough to make a calendar of them.

A. S. A., Woonsocket, R. I. Although to-day we speak and write of Mt. Ararat, it is perhaps more accurate to say "mountains of Ararat." There are several peaks in the range. The word "Ararat" is interpreted by Bohlen and Benfey, from Sanscrit, as meaning "sacred land." It was probably a country and a kingdom (see Jer. 5:27). Another derivation—though a legendary one—is said to be "Ararad" (the "ruin of Arai"), referring to a great native prince of that country who was killed B.C. 1750 by the Babylonians, who overthrew the native kingdom.

W. J. C., Fredericton, N. B. 1. What will happen to the world's food and fuel supply two centuries hence need not trouble us. Scientists calculate that, though the coal measures may be exhausted, other fuels will take their place, and are doing so even now. There is no present apprehension of the shortage of food within two centuries, as even with a much larger population the rapid increase of food-growth areas will keep pace with the need. 2. The Unitarians believe in one God; they are monotheists; they reject the divinity of Christ. 3. Christ's words concerning the indifference of many to the Gospel are as true to-day as when he uttered them. 4. The powers of evil, which is what you mean, are recognized in Scripture in many passages. Life is a constant battle between the forces of good and evil.

A Fourteen-Year-Old Oratorio Singer

Miss Susie Schmolze

MISS SUSIE SCHMOLZE, of Philadelphia, Pa., is one of the most charming and promising young American singers. Although she is only fourteen years of age, and is still attending school, she has a high soprano voice of marvelous range and timbre. She has sung the leading part in many of the great oratorios, and she has also sung solos in the Chapman-Alexander, the Biederwolf-Rodeheaver and other great union evangelistic services conducted in Philadelphia, her native city. Only recently she sang the part of the king's daughter in the oratorio "Belshazzar." She often sings in sacred concerts with the leading singers of Philadelphia, and has sometimes accompanied them to other cities.

At the great Chapman-Alexander meetings, in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, Miss Schmolze's singing was much appreciated, especially one night when she arose in one of the boxes and sang a portion of Mr. Harkness' hymn, "Shadows." Mr. Alexander had called on her to sing without any previous notice, but she sang with pathos and power and reached the hearts of many in the vast audience. Miss Schmolze's singing was also well received in the great union meetings conducted by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, the well-known evangelist.

Miss Schmolze is a pupil of Professor Walter Palmer Hoxie, of Philadelphia. It is her ambition to devote her life to sacred music.

Gospel Sunshine in a Prison

MANY of our readers will be interested in this letter from a convict in Dannemora Prison, New York, which shows how joy and inspiration can be shed abroad within stone walls, by a little kindness from those who enjoy the blessings of freedom:

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD: Permit me gratefully to acknowledge your many kindnesses to me, and to tell you how I have tried to carry sunshine into the lives of others, because of what you sent me. The thirty-six beautiful pictures I distributed among the prisoners, and they are highly appreciated. Many of them have been framed and now hang on the whitewashed walls of cells, making them more cheery to the occupants. So eager was the demand for them that I did not keep any for myself—being only too glad to do this little bit to make brighter the lot of my fellows. The messages of thanks which I received more than repaid me for the opportunity of helping them. The little Red Letter New Testament I have kept for myself. Besides this, THE CHRISTIAN HERALDS which I receive are made to go round among a great many fellows, who appreciate them. Most of the men have nothing else to read, as a rule, but one library book a week. So you see how highly such men can appreciate extra literature.

Indeed, I have thought long and deeply on the problem of trying to do some missionary work along this line for the prisoners, who have nothing at all. I believe it to be a worthy cause, in which much good can be foreseen. Christ said, "I was in prison and ye visited me," but in these days most persons are too deeply absorbed in other work to do this personally. May I not suggest an alternative? Many of your kind readers may appreciate its possibilities.

There are many prisoners who never receive a letter from one year's end to another. Neither do they have an opportunity to see any of the current magazines or newspapers. Hence these men leave prison, after years, with scarcely any knowledge of the progress of the world on the outside. Sometimes we read in the newspapers that some ex-prisoner goes out, after years, and sees an electric car on the streets of cities for the first time. In this age of humanitarianism it seems to me that such things could be remedied; and they can be. The rules of prisons do not forbid the circulation of high-class literature among the prisoners, but the prisoners cannot (hundreds of them) pay the subscription price to obtain weekly and monthly periodicals. That is where the whole difficulty lies.

It seems to me that right here is a chance to do much good, and I will gladly undertake to either supply the names of prisoners who are absolutely friendless, to whom second-hand weekly and monthly periodicals of high class can be sent, or I will distribute them for any one who will send them to me. Recent publications are preferred, not over a month old, in good condition. I will have them put into durable binders for protracted circulation. I believe that the greatest inducement one can have toward leading a better life is in reading high-class literature, and the object I have in view is well met by the many leading weekly and monthly magazines. The readers would be somewhat up to date, and the matter read would be inspirational.

Any kind-hearted person who desires to help in this work may either write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and state the name or names of the periodicals he or she can send and for how long it will be sent. By so doing we can avoid useless duplication, and know how to systematize the circulation of those periodicals sent among the greatest number of prisoners.

For the next eight years I can give my personal attention to this work, which I believe will be fruitful of much good in every way. It will require labor on my part, but this I will cheerfully undertake.

We will be glad to give the name of the writer of this letter to such of our readers as may wish to have a share in this good work, which we cordially commend to all.

Still Preaching at Ninety-Five

REV. WILLIAM HURLIN, of Antrim, N. H., is probably the oldest minister in active service in the country. He was ninety-five years old on the last day of July, and still preaches with a great deal of vigor. His wife died a few years ago, soon after she and her husband had celebrated their seventieth wedding anniversary. Mr. Hurlin was born in London in 1814, and preached his first sermon in 1835, after walking several miles to church. From that day to this he has been a gratuitous preacher. He was for nine years a city missionary in London, and received pay for his services; but since that time he has been a lay preacher, without salary.

Rev. William Hurlin

In June, 1849, he came to America with his wife and five children, and has lived in Maine and New Hampshire ever since. He has been for forty years a trustee of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention, and holds a number of offices in this denomination. Mr. Hurlin has never used glasses and has always had good health. He is as active as many men twenty years younger, and expects to keep right on preaching.

A Great Organizer Gone

WITH the death of Edward H. Harriman, at his home near Turner, N. Y., on September 9, there passed from American business life one of its most commanding personalities, a man whose career as a consolidator and developer of railroads has not been equaled in American history. Mr. Harriman's position was such that he was much, though unwillingly on his part, in the public eye. As he did not care to take the public into his confidence, he was often misunderstood and made the object of newspaper attack. In recent years, however, the results to the business of the country at large began to be seen, and he himself gave out interviews stating his own position and what he hoped his plans would do to better railroad facilities. A change in consequence was wrought, to a certain extent, in the public mind, and the very papers who were his harshest critics ranked him as one of the most remarkable men of business this country has ever produced. At the same time they recognized that he considered business as a kind of warfare, in which the rewards went to the strong; that little quarter would be given to those who opposed his far-reaching plans.

Copyright by Pach Bros.

Edward H. Harriman

It is undoubted that Mr. Harriman wished his vast system of railroads to be of real benefit to the merchants and the farmers; that with his own private ambition to be the greatest railroad man in America there was also a patriotic purpose to serve his country, build up roads which had been ruined by unwise management and speculation, and by building new lines develope large areas which might be made productive if they had transportation facilities to the larger distributing centres.

Mr. Harriman's career is one of the most interesting in our strenuous American business life, which has been so productive of astonishing careers from poverty to wealth, from obscurity to power. Mr. Harriman came from a cultured family, but one which had not turned its attention to business, and which, during his early years, had difficulty at times to make both ends meet. His father, Rev. Orlando Harriman, was an Episcopal clergyman, and the future railroad king was born in the rectory of St. George's Church, at Hempstead, Long Island, in 1848. The family later moved to Hoboken, N. J. The family income at the time was very small; in fact, it is stated that it was but $200 a year, and consequently young Harriman was unable to secure more of an education than was afforded by two years' study in church schools. He owed much to his mother, a woman whose resourcefulness, under the most discouraging circumstances, kept the family together. As soon as he was old enough to go to work he had to cast about for something to add to the family exchequer. He had no ancestry or environment which would lead him to a career of finance. His ambitions lay entirely in another direction, toward a profession in which the financial returns are meagre. It was his cherished ambition to become a soldier, and he was most anxious to secure an appointment to West Point, and study for an officer's commission. This dream was never realized. At sixteen he had to do something to help his family and, putting aside all hope of a military career, he secured a position as office boy in a broker's office in Wall Street, in New York City. He soon found that he was adapted to such a career as Wall Street offered at that day, and he set about learning the "work of finance" from the bottom up. He ran errands and acted as clerk but always kept his eyes open and studied every move of his employer in the great game of finance.

He learned his lessons well, and the teachers of the day were the most cold-blooded, perhaps the most unscrupulous, in the history of American commercial development. Each one was fighting for his own benefit without regard to who would suffer, providing his own personal ends were attained.

Wall Street of to-day is far different in its dealings; there may be just as much selfishness, just as much bitterness in the great struggle which is waged there for the control of great business enterprises, but it is kept more under control.

Harriman acquired for himself early the designation of being one of the most cool-blooded of the younger men who were becoming known as future factors in the manipulation of financial ventures. He first became actively interested in railroads in 1883, when he was made a director of the Illinois Central.

It was not until 1897 that he began to figure in the public eye. He began to buy up the stock of the bankrupt Union Pacific, and made it a paying property, after a long struggle with the Hill and Morgan forces for its control. He acquired control of enough roads to make a complete transcontinental system. He had absolute control of five roads and was the chief figure in the control of six others, the total mileage being 65,176.

It is said that he performed many charitable acts, but disliked to have it known. Mr. Harriman's generosity in granting free transportation over his roads to California for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S relief cargo of flour for famine-stricken China, in 1907, will be remembered by the readers of this paper. His gift was equivalent to an addition of $15,000 to the relief fund. President Hughitt and President James J. Hill also carried part of the relief cargo free over their respective roads at the same time. The cargo was carried to China on the United States troopship Buford, and was the means of saving many thousands of lives.

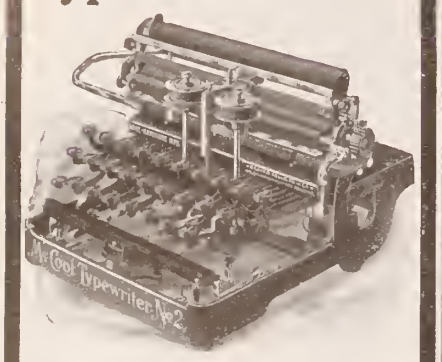
THE McCool Typewriter $25



A strictly first-class business typewriter for business use

Will do ALL you could ask of any typewriter. Side by side you cannot tell the difference between a letter written on the McCool and on a $100 machine. Will handle all correspondence required of any machine.

Sold direct from factory to you. Every middle profit cut out. Saves 45% in price. Only 319 PARTS against 2500 AND MORE in the high priced typewriters. This saves 30% in price.

We have over half a million dollars invested in our big manufacturing plant, covering five acres—one of the largest in the country.

The McCool is made in our factory. We buy material for 15,000 to 20,000 typewriters at a time.

Every one of the 319 parts of the McCool is selected, put to supreme test for quality and accuracy. Every bearing and wearing surface is of hardened steel, finished to microscopical fineness, adjusted by micrometer.

The price recommends the McCOOL to business houses and merchants; particularly the smaller merchant, lawyer, clergyman, student, physician, teacher, where a typewriter has heretofore been thought prohibitive in price.

If you never saw a typewriter you can write on the McCOOL. Very simple. Nothing to learn but the keyboard.

The McCool Typewriter is unqualifiedly guaranteed in every way.

Shipped anywhere, carefully packed and boxed, delivered to any Express Company for $25.00. This is our factory price—absolutely the lowest ever made on a first-class typewriter. The Express charges vary with distances, but add very little to this our factory price.

You are perfectly safe. Remit $25. Test the McCOOL 10 days in the privacy of your office or home. If it fails in any way to meet your expectations, if you do not find it even BETTER than we have described—a handsome machine, greatly superior in every way—your money and express charges will be refunded promptly without argument. You have absolutely nothing to lose.

For $2.50 additional we will include a substantial Wood, Leatherette Covered Carrying Case with Brass Yale Lock and Key, Side Clasps, Genuine Leather Handles. A handsome, practical outfit, which with the Typewriter is about the size and weight of a hand grip.

You MUST READ our handsome illustrated Booklet fully describing the McCOOL Typewriter—the achievement of the century in typewriter construction. Free on request.

THE DOCTOR'S WIFE

Agrees With Him About Food.

A trained nurse says: "In the practice of my profession I have found so many points in favor of Grape-Nuts food that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all my patients.

"It is delicate and pleasing to the palate (an essential in food for the sick) and can be adapted to all ages, being softened with milk or cream for babies or the aged when deficiency of teeth renders mastication impossible. For fever patients or those on liquid diet I find 'Grape-Nuts and albumen water very nourishing and refreshing.'

"This recipe is my own idea and is made as follows: Soak a teaspoonful of Grape-Nuts in a glass of water for an hour, strain and serve with the beaten white of an egg and a spoonful of fruit juice for flavoring. This affords a great deal of nourishment that even the weakest stomach can assimilate without any distress.

"My husband is a physician and he uses Grape-Nuts himself and orders it many times for his patients.

"Personally, I regard a dish of Grape-Nuts with fresh or stewed fruit as the ideal breakfast for anyone—well or sick."

In any case of stomach trouble, nervous prostration or brain fag, a 10-day trial of Grape-Nuts will work wonders toward nourishing and rebuilding, and in this way ending the trouble.

"There's a Reason," and trial proves.

PROGRESS OF WOMEN

By Kate Upson Clark

THE idea of the great petition to Congress, projected by our suffrage societies, to be signed by a million women, is excellent. It will set forth the injustice done to half of our adult population by depriving them of votes, and will outline the benefits likely to result from giving them the suffrage. That any tremendous or immediate improvement in our government will follow from such a change is not likely; but gradually and inevitably an uplifting of politics and of society must result.

There is nothing more humorously absurd than the way in which the vast majority of men, both in life and in literature, dilate upon the goodness and ability of their mothers and yet deny them the right to vote. If they dread to have these pure spirits defiled by the mire of politics, let that mire be cleared away. Women are the great cleaners-up of the race—physically, mentally and morally. Not all of them are good and pure; but the vast majority will, if they are but permitted, lay their hands efficiently to the work.

Since most of the educated American men who oppose woman suffrage do so because they say the women themselves do not want it, women should sign this petition freely and show that they do want it. Timidity and conservatism are strongly intrenched in the feminine nature; added to this fact it may be that, in a particular community, woman suffrage is unpopular, and its advocates bring upon themselves ridicule and scorn; or, the men of one's household may be opposed to the movement and make things unpleasant for the woman suffragists there. All of these motives have combined to hush many a woman who, in her heart, longs to vote beside her husband and her sons. If possible without causing family discord, let every good woman sign her name to this monster petition. Show the doubters that American women in large numbers do want to vote.

It is singular that in most other cases of this sort men have not waited for women to indicate a universal desire before granting them any particular promotion. The higher education was desired by only a few women at first. The arguments used against it were almost precisely those which are now used against woman suffrage. At this moment, very many people, possibly a majority, do not approve of a college education for women. Yet when a few noble girls came forward and begged to study the same branches that their brothers studied, the privilege was granted them. Miss Blackwell tells us that, when Vassar College was opened, a prominent woman voiced the general feeling when she said, "The mere fact that it is called a college for women is enough to condemn it. Of one thing we may be sure: no refined Christian mother will ever send her daughter to Vassar College." All this sounds laughable and even incredible to us now, and so will the present argument against woman suffrage a score of years after it is adopted.

An effort is making in the Orient to strip the veils off from the faces of the women. The effort is resisted stoutly by the vast majority of those women; but, in spite of them, they will soon be rid of this shackle, and of others to which they cling as blindly. Again, it is timidity and conservatism, valuable traits when rightly employed, which hold women back from the noble benefits which are theirs by right.

The sensational and undignified tactics of the so-called suffragettes fail to command the approval of the vast body of thoughtful suffragists. Such displays may be necessary in other countries. It cannot be possible that our men will be rendered by them more favorable to the cause. Cannot these women, most of them good and very able, devise methods more in consonance with the beauty and righteousness of the great cause in which they are engaged?

Helping Monterey's Sufferers

this mud, filled with odds and ends, sticks and broken household utensils.

Thousands of people are living in the cathedral and churches, and are being fed by public and private charity.

Consul-General Hanna has provided for over one thousand unfortunates at the American consulate. They were supplied with simple cotton dresses and given food. The gratitude of the women and children was most touching. All tried to thank him in some way, and the little children crowded around him whenever he appeared and endeavored to kiss his hand. By so doing they expressed their gratitude not only to him, but to the American people at large, who are helping them in their hour of need.

The consulate was made one of the centres of relief. Sewing machines were quickly installed, and volunteer seamstresses called for. More than a sufficient number of ladies answered the call, and for days the consulate was as busy a place as there was to be found in stricken Monterey. Food was given without question to all who applied, and all day long there was a steady stream of haggard and emaciated men, women and children who came to throw themselves on the bounty of the Americans.

The Americans and Mexicans are working together with the greatest good will. The municipal authorities have established relief stations, at which bread, coffee and soup are given out, while the more wealthy residents of the city are supplying food as well as clothing for their less fortunate compatriots. Both Americans and Mexicans have contributed freely to the Mayor's Fund, which is being used to purchase food, and although the response to the Mayor's appeal has been liberal it has been insufficient to meet the crying need of the hungry and homeless families, and a much more urgent appeal has been made.

As announced in the previous issue of this paper, The Christian Herald is receiving contributions, to be applied to the relief of the stricken people of Monterey. Consul-General Hanna's second appeal gives a vivid idea of the dire need existing in the flood district, and the response of the American people should be both generous and prompt, as it has been in the past for sufferers from famine and flood. The distress of these people, who are at our very doors, calls for both sympathy and material aid. No one should hesitate because he can give only a small amount. All contributions should be addressed to The Mexican Relief Fund, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Life Lessons from Ephesians*

A DISTINGUISHED Bible student once spent an hour daily for an entire year upon the Epistle to the Ephesians. He had been familiar with it from childhood, but he said that this special study revealed to him truths and beauties in it which he had never before seen, and that it contained the substance of the whole Gospel.

Paul, himself an educated man, had little patience with the contented ignorance in which many of the early Christians lived. He wished for them the wisdom and understanding which they were not bright enough to desire for themselves. His epistles contain many injunctions to this end. His prime object was that thereby they might the more clearly behold "the riches of the glory of their inheritance in the saints"; but he realized, as an uneducated man could not, the need that the new faith should have not only virtuous, but keen and learned advocates. They were to strive to be, as Christ had said, not only harmless as doves, but wise as serpents.

Yet they were to be humble. Humility does not come with half learning; it usually belongs either to the utterly ignorant or to the thoroughly cultured. "If any man think that he knoweth anything, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know," Paul says in his first Epistle to the Corinthians.

They were to be no "children in understanding"; they were to approve themselves as ministers of God by virtue first, but also by knowledge. Paul commended the Corinthians because they "abounded in knowledge." Now he extends a similar admonition to the Ephesians and bids them, when they don the "whole armor of God," to have their loins "girt about with the truth," which is the object of all study, as the mottoes of our two greatest Eastern universities testify.

A striking expression in this book is the following: "Who, being past feeling, have given themselves over to lasciviousness."

"Past feeling." It is a frightful state. Nothing matters to the man any more. He has become a mere sinful machine, stumbling along in the slimy path which he has chosen, blind-hearted and having his understanding darkened, alienated from God through the ignorance that is in him, and no longer capable of feeling—a mere clod, a man in shape, but a beast in reality.

This appalling callousness can come from courses which we have not been wont to place in the list of the grosser sins. The present lust for gold has made many an otherwise good man into a monster of cruelty.

Thus when the ships of the North German Lloyd Company were burning at their dock in one of the most terrible fires New York has ever seen, it is said that certain tug captains ruthlessly hurried by drowning men in order to pick up the bales of cotton which had been thrown into the water. The cotton was worth money. The chances were that they would get nothing for saving the men. Those mercenary captains were "past feeling"!

The great underlying principle of this wonderful book is love. Paul preaches love in season and out of season—and yet our modern seers are exploiting the Gospel of love as though it were a novelty and the New Testament were not full of it. We must "be holy and without blame before him in love." "I heard of your love unto all the saints," he says, "and I gave thanks"; "the love of Christ passeth knowledge," "speak the truth in love," "forbear one another in love," "walk in love," "husbands and wives, love each other." Paul's astute mind grasped the great truth that love solves all our human problems.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 3. TEXT: Eph. 4 : 1-6, 25-32.

Obedience and Abundance*

IT is said that men are ready enough to commend any good enterprise until it solicits their pockets. Then they are likely to feel a sudden chill and their interest subsides.

And yet if you have confidence in an enterprise, you are generally willing to invest your money in it. The extent of your confidence is likely to be measured by the amount of your investment.

The teachings of Scripture are emphatic upon the subject of giving. Especially was our Saviour clear and strong upon this point. "Give and it shall be given unto you"; "If any man take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also"; "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away"; "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth"; "Take no thought for the morrow;" "Take heed and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth"; "Provide neither gold nor silver for your journey"; "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it"; Forgive your brother, not seven times only, but "seventy times seven"; "Sell all thou hast, and give to the poor"; "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God"; "Leave all and follow me"; His commendation of the poor widow who cast into the treasury "all her living"; "Woe unto you who are rich"; "Give alms as ye are able"; and many other of his words, breathe a spirit of utter generosity. There was to be no limit to gifts of time, strength, love and money in his service.

For the old New England expression for wealth explains its true purpose. It is "means," and means only. The great end to be attained by every life is the glory of God, and to this end our wealth is an important means.

Paul spoke rather strongly when he said to Timothy that the love of money is the root of all evil; but it is surely the root of much evil. Many a family has lived in peace and harmony until a fortune has come to them, and disputes have arisen regarding its division. Many a youth has approached manhood with high and pure ideals, which fell into ruin before the assaults of the accursed love of gain.

So rare is the spirit of unselfishness that men noted for their generosity stand out like beacon lights along the pages of history; while literature, and especially poesy, seize them for their own and immortalize them.

Thus it is related of Parkhurst, the distinguished lexicographer, that he had a tenant who fell behind in the payment of his rent. It was represented to Mr. Parkhurst that the rent was too high. A new valuation was made, and on that basis fifty pounds less per annum was set as the proper sum. Upon learning of the reduction, this noble landlord insisted upon returning to his tenant fifty pounds for each of the several years during which he had paid the larger sum, convinced that the rent must always have been too high. Parkhurst's achievements in his profession are nearly forgotten, but this story lives.

It is seldom that a character is found to be consistently generous. Some of our modern philanthropists, who have given vast sums for charity, are said to be mean in their personal expenses; but wherever we may pinch, let it not be in the spending for our church and its societies.

Statistics tell us that the world disburses nearly two billions of dollars yearly for whisky and tobacco, and only $400,000,000 for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Shame to us all that this is so!

LASTING CONSTRUCTION

Malleable Iron is the first essential to lasting construction in a range. The brittle grey iron of ordinary ranges can only be bolted and puttied to the steel. MONARCH Ranges have frames of Malleable Iron. The steel plates of the body and oven are riveted to them, making a solid joint that stays tight a life time. A range built in any other manner wastes fuel, time, and patience. It pays to be sure about materials and construction in buying.

TRIPLE WALLS

Don't be misguided by other's claims for "triple asbestos walls." Hundreds of ranges that are claimed "completely asbestos lined" have but single thickness metal walls under the oven. By a special building process the MONARCH is made with walls of steel—asbestos—and steel at every point exposed to the flame and heat. MONARCH triple walls cannot burn through—rust through—or become damaged by the creosote in the flues.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXXVI—Continued

ALREADY the frenzy of terror was subsiding. Everywhere officers and ushers were soothing, directing, and marshaling the throngs into something like order, and their coolness was contagious. It was plain that all danger of a panic was over. Once on the street Marco forced a way through the surging crowd, and was fortunate enough to find almost immediately a carriage to take them home.

Once seated quietly in the carriage he turned and faced her—and the realization came.

Her eyes were still luminous, but to her cheeks had come a rosy flush. She, too, had suddenly realized that they were back in the everyday world—that their souls had not ascended in flame and smoke during that wild moment of heart-revealing candor.

"There's nothing I can say, of course," began Marco, brokenly. "I did not mean to be a traitor to Preston. But at such a time——" he paused, and laid his hand on hers; "Florence, you understand!"

She nodded her head silently. She would not meet his eyes. She had turned, and was persistently gazing out of the window at the shifting lights and shadows of the street.

"When I saw you there, alone, with the smoke swirling up about you, and with that light in your eyes, I forgot Howard and his love for you, and the reason why I had left you."

She stirred suddenly.

"And is that—why—you went away?" she asked.

"Yes. I was trying to play square. I found out how he felt, and I knew then that I must not stay."

She laughed a little shyly.

"But you didn't seen to take—me into consideration," she murmured.

He sighed and shook his head.

"I didn't think I needed to. I didn't see how any girl could help caring for him—when he cared so much for her."

"But I never cared for him—that way," she protested. "Besides, I have been doing my best to make him care for some one else."

A quick joy leaped to Marco's eyes.

"And have you—will he—can she?" As he stopped helplessly, Florence laughed.

"That's exactly the trouble! 'Have I?'—'Will he?'—and 'Can she?' They are questions I ask myself a dozen times a day. It is Madge Dana, you know, and she's a dear. I think he's beginning to think so too, himself, a little. I hope so. Anyhow, I told him two months ago that I knew now I could never care for him—that way."

Marco leaned forward eagerly.

"You've told him that—already?"

"Yes."

"Then I—Florence!"—he was trying to look into her face, but she still kept it steadily from him—"Florence, then your eyes did tell me the truth back there in the corridor, and I may be—as happy as I please?" he finished softly.

She hesitated, then drew in her breath with a little tremulous break, and turned and looked straight into his eyes.

"I think—after I ran all the way back in that smoke just for you, that I shan't—tell you—any more!" she faltered; and the next moment she was sobbing in his arms.

CHAPTER XXXVII

"LOST ON THE OCEAN WAVE"

FOR three days, at least two young people in New York had been living in a paradise of happiness. Coming, as it did, after long months of loneliness and uncertainty, it was all the more overwhelming, both to Florence and Marco. Even Preston's possible sorrow did not immediately have to be considered, for that young man had started the week before for California, and he would not return for some time.

"Besides," Florence had said to Marco, "he loves you, and he loves me, and he would want above everything else that we should be happy. And I haven't given up yet about Madge, either. He didn't tell me, but I found out yesterday, that Madge is in California, too, this winter with friends. As I said, he didn't tell me—but I happen to be pretty sure that he knows it. Anyway, I'm just counting on Madge!"

Mrs. Preston had promptly expressed her pleasure and given her blessing; and after that there seemed to be really nothing wanting to make the lovers' happiness complete. And then came the day when that happiness was just four days old.

The two young people were at the top of the house, practising a new duet. The beautiful music-room had always been a favorite with both of them; and it had never seemed more lovely than it did to-day with the last rays of the sun falling through the alcove-window where the boy Marco had so long ago played his violin.

In the new music that he was now playing, Marco had found a curious melody—a weird little phrase that made him stop abruptly.

"Why, how odd!" he murmured. "That is almost exactly like it."

"Like what?"

"A little tune that I used to play years ago."

"Perhaps it is the same," suggested the girl. "It sounded almost familiar to me, too. I think I have heard it somewhere."

"Oh, but you couldn't have heard it, dear," objected Marco, "because it's one of my own that I composed myself long ago, when a boy. It was never published. Besides, this one is quite new, and of course it isn't the same. It only reminded me of a part of it."

"Yours? One of your own? Play it. Did I ever hear it?"

"Possibly, though I think not. I haven't played it much lately, except when alone. It's a sad little thing, and has only sorrowful memories for me. I had such great hopes of what would sometimes come from it—and it failed me. However, you shall hear it." And he raised his violin to position.

"No, no! If it makes you sad, don't play it, dear. We don't want to be sad to-day, when we're so happy—so wonderfully happy. It seems as if I just couldn't bear to be sad to-day!"

"And we won't be, dear," smiled Marco. "But I want to play it—to you; and then I'll tell you the story of it." And he softly drew the bow across the strings in the first strains of "Lost on the Ocean Wave."

Before the piece was ended, Florence was on her feet, her eyes startled and questioning. When it was finished, she clapped her hands lightly.

"I have heard it! That was the piece—not this," she cried, tapping the new music on the rack before her.

"But, Florence, how could you? That is my piece!"

"I don't know. But I did hear it. It was when—" she paused, and half closed her eyes. In the dim past of her memory she was groping for a clew that would help her; "it was—there was a picture, all sky and sea, and—and one little boat—all—alone,"

THE STORY OF MARCO

she finished dreamily, just above her breath.

The color fled from Marco's face. Even his lips were bloodless.

"Florence, where did you—see—that—picture?" he breathed.

"I don't know. I think—'twas in a book—a little book with green covers; and the picture was—was—'Lost on the Ocean Wave.' Now I have it!" she exulted, turning to him in gleeful triumph. The next instant she stepped back. "Marco—why, Marco!" she cried in dismay.

"No, no, Florence," he was imploring. "You are mistaken. It was not green—that little book! You don't know what it was. I must have told you about it! I—" he stopped abruptly. His face grew ashen. Mechanically he laid down the violin and placed the bow carefully at its side. Then he turned back to the girl and sat down near her. Outwardly he was calm; but his voice shook when he spoke.

"Florence, dear, try to remember; tell me all that you can of yourself before you came here—to live."

She shook her head, and her eyes grew troubled.

"There isn't much that I can tell. I was very small, not more than six or seven, and Mrs. Preston has never let me talk of those days. All she told me was that I was the daughter of her dearest friend, who was dead. She said that for some years after I was born she didn't know where I was; then they found me in a gipsy camp—"

"Then it is true—it is true!" moaned the man, dropping his face into his hands.

"What is true? What do you mean?" demanded the girl, her voice sharp with vague terror. Then something in the abject misery of his attitude sent her thoughts back to the cause of his first cry of dismay, and she caught at that to find a possible explanation.

"That little melody—I remember now," she went on hurriedly. "It was there that I heard it—in the gipsy camp. There was a boy—my brother—" she stopped suddenly. Her face grew white. The terror in her eyes was not vague now. With a sharp cry she sprang to her feet.

"Marco, you aren't—you can't be—he!"

He dropped his hands and faced her. She did not need his words; his eyes answered her.

"But your name—that boy was Marco Bonelli," she faltered.

He bowed his head.

"And that was my name, once. My father changed it since—for some reason; I don't know what. I have not meant to deceive you," he added brokenly. "I have tried to find out, and I meant to find out before I ever—spoke to you. And then that night—you know the rest."

A spasm of pain crossed the girl's face.

"I know," she choked. She turned and dropped into a chair some distance away, shielding her eyes with her hand. The man, too, sat down, in helpless misery. After a time he spoke again.

"Only yesterday I went to the hospital, but father was too ill to talk. He was not quite rational, in fact. The nurse says he is often that way now. If only I could have known—something, weeks ago. It might have saved us—this," he groaned.

She made a gesture of dissent.

"It couldn't have changed things—much. You'd still be—my brother," she said tremulously. "It's so terrible; so—so confused. Howard isn't my brother, and I love him as if he were. You are my brother, and I—I love you as if you—weren't."

Marco sprang to his feet. His face was set, and his hands hung at his sides, tightly clenched.

"Florence, I must get away—somewhere—and thresh this thing out with myself. I can't stand it—here," he gasped. "This is something we can't fight out—together!" And with a sob such as the strongest man gives sometimes, he was gone.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

A Terrible Night

MARCO did not go back to his hotel at all that night. True to his boyhood love for the open when in trouble, he could not bear the thought of taking his grief into the suffocation of four walls. In the great Park he paced the countless winding paths until the silence drove him back to the streets.

At midnight he turned into quieter ways, and spent the morning hours steadily ploddin, on and on until he was physically so weary that he thought sleep could have no choice but to come and give his misery at least a brief oblivion. Then at dawn he went back to the hotel and to bed.

It was a letter marked "Deliver immediately" and sent by a special messenger, that aroused him at nine o'clock. He smiled sadly as he saw the handwriting. He was not surprised that he had heard from Florence so soon. It was like her to go to the root of the matter at once; and into his mind flashed a little story that Mrs. Preston frequently told of Florence's childhood—a foolish little story such as sometimes comes to one even when that one's heart is heaviest with sorrow. Florence was ten years old, and was told one night that she must go to the dentist the next day to have a tooth out. At three o'clock in the morning, Mrs. Preston was aroused by a white-faced, blue-lipped child, who was fully dressed even to hat and coat, and who announced with Spartan-like firmness that she was ready.

Marco was still smiling at this picture when he opened the letter, but he had not read three words when he crushed it in his hand, and held it with close-locked fingers. For a moment he stood rigid; then he loosened his fingers and raised the letter to his lips before he remorsefully smoothed the crumpled little sheet, and spread it out before him. This time he read the letter to the end without pause.

"Dear Brother," (Florence had written). "You and I will have to face this thing. There is no way out of it, nor round it—only through it. Ever since I have known you, you have been true blue—the 'red, white and blue' of your boyhood—(oh, I know that story; never mind how!)—and I am sure you will not fail me in this. The next time I see you I shall look straight into your eyes, and I shall find in them only that which will help me; only that which will make me—'red, white and blue,' too.

"And now for our plans. I want to see—father right away, if I may. I know, of course, that there is no mistake, yet I feel that I want to know all that I can of mother, and my childhood. Then, too, he has been deprived all these years of a daughter's love and care. I want to do what I can to make that up to him. You will be away soon, on your concert trip; and while you are gone I shall try to take your place—and my own.

"I have said nothing to Mrs. Preston, as yet. She is nervous, and not very well, and this will grieve her deeply, of course. Before I tell her, I want to know just what to say; and I can do that better after I have seen father. Will you not go to him today, and prepare him for—his new daughter? I want to go to him soon, if I may. Believe me, Marco, the one thing that I feel I cannot bear just now is delay.

"I am glad that your work will take you away before long. It is better so, I am sure. In time we may—we must—conquer this thing. FLORENCE."

He or she has no doubt about it. A California lady says:

"I learned the truth about coffee in a peculiar way. My husband, who has for years been of a very bilious temperament, decided to leave off coffee and give Postum a trial, and as I did not want the trouble of making two beverages for meals I concluded to try Postum, too, and the results have been that while my husband has been greatly benefited, I have myself received even greater benefit.

Slander and Hardship *

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

SLANDEROUS tongues began to wag against the apostle Paul in the very beginning of his work as a preacher of the Gospel of Christ.

If slander be a snake, it is a winged one—it flies as well as creeps.—DOUGLAS JERROLD.

It flew from Damascus to Jerusalem, to Antioch, to Derbe, to Lystra, to Iconium, to Thessalonica, to Berea, to Corinth, to Ephesus, and back again to Jerusalem; wherever Paul went, it followed him. Generally Paul passed on to the next city, or changed base, as in Corinth when he left off preaching in the synagogue and went to the home of Titus Justus to do his work; and in Ephesus when he left the synagogue, and did his teaching in the lecture hall of Tyrannus. The slander-scorpions were relentless; for thirteen years of missionary labor they had followed him from pillar to post, and when at length he came to Jerusalem to sum up his labors he found them cause it involved Paul in the expense of buying twenty sacrificial animals, four for each of the four men, and four for himself; for Paul became as a Nazarite with them. As a tent-maker Paul certainly had no superfluity of cash, and so it was a hard thing which James and the elders had asked him to do.

As to the vow of the Nazarite, it may be said that it bound him to abstain from all strong drink, from the juice of the grape, and from fruit produced by the vine. The length of the vow was determined for a longer or shorter period by the one who took it. Sometimes it was for thirty days, sometimes for life. The badge of the Nazarite was his long hair, for during the time of his vow he was neither to be shaven nor shorn. This will be recognized as a most ancient total abstinence society!

Paul, in the spirit of "becoming all things to all men," readily agreed to the suggestion of James and the elders. It was not an unusual thing to do. Rich people, and even potentates, paid the charges of indigent Nazarites in order to obtain their prayers. When a Nazarite's hair was cut it was burned under the sacrifice of the peace offering as a symbol of friendship with God.

The Tower of Antonia, where the Roman Guard Was Stationed there in force. It is said that "when the Jews from Asia saw him in the temple they stirred up all the multitude, and laid hands on him."

Let us listen to their hissing. "This is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people and the law, and this place (the temple); and moreover he brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath defiled this holy place." Never were tongues more clearly "set on fire by hell" than those which thus wagged against Paul. That day his Father's house was a den of serpents! They were congregated in the Court of the Women, which contained an apartment where ceremonies were performed connected with the fulfilment of Nazarite vows. Paul was there at the suggestion of James, the pastor of the Christian Church in Jerusalem, and all the elders of that church. They had told Paul that reports had been circulated among the Jews that he was subverting the law of Moses, and they advised him to show publicly his loyalty to Moses by helping four Nazarites to fulfil their vows. It was no small request, because

Paul's appearance in the temple had just the opposite effect from what James and the elders thought it would have; it inflamed the venom of the slander-scorpions and incited them to mob violence. The guardians of the temple, fearing bloodshed and consequent polluting of the holy place, closed the gate leading from the Court of the Women to the Court of Israel, and the Court of the Priests also, because they feared Paul would lay hold on the altar itself as a place where none might dare to touch him. It would be like throwing himself into the very arms of God. The arrows of slander flew thick and fast as they charged Paul with having brought a Greek into the sacred enclosure beyond the Court of the Gentiles, and charged him also with teaching contrary to Moses and the law; and they even

Means Economy and Winter Comfort

Winter is Hard on the Home. The rain and snow, sleet and ice penetrate unprotected surfaces, and when Spring comes moisture and decay have done their deadly work. Winter's mud grinds your floors. Winter's soot blackens your walls. Winter's steam discolors the finish of woodwork and furniture. Winter plays havoc with all surfaces of the home unless they are protected with the right paint or finish. A coat of good paint now will protect your building. The proper finish will make your floors easy to clean and prevent them from wearing white. A coat of No-Lustre Finish will give your walls a beautiful finish, which can be kept clean by the occasional use of a damp cloth. Furniture and woodwork can easily be made soot-proof and moisture-proof by any inexperienced housewife.

Go to your paint dealer, tell him just what surfaces need refinishing and ask for the proper charged him with defaming the temple.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

'Tis slander
Whose edge is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
Rides on the parting winds, and doth belie
All comers of the world; kings, queens and states,
Maids, matrons, nay, the secrets of the grave.
—SHAKESPEARE.

We do not read that Paul tried to defend himself against the accusations. He was overcome and dragged out by the mob, intending to stone him to death. But the watchful eyes of the Roman soldiers in the Tower of Antonia spied the mob, which having reported to the chief captain, they were dispatched and quickly made their way, not through the crowd, but through an underground passage which led from the tower into the Court of the Gentiles. They rescued Paul by arresting him. They bound him with chains and bore him away on their shoulders to the castle of Antonia to secure him against the mob. The arrows of slander flew thicker and faster, so that there was an uproar, some crying one thing and some another. We can judge of the state of Paul's mind under all those trying circumstances when we read that after reaching the stairs of the castle he asked the chief captain's leave to speak to the people. The noble bearing and the request of Paul were a surprise to the captain, who had taken his prisoner for an outlaw. Permission was given, and Paul from his place of safety on the castle stairs, surrounded by Roman soldiers, spoke words of truth and plainness. He told them the whole story of his conversion to Christianity, hoping to appease them, but they were all the more embittered and cried out, "Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live!" And then the chief captain commanded him to be brought inside of the castle. And slander had done its worst, but Paul was safe!

It was told the poet Tasso that an enemy had spoken ill of him. "Let him persevere," said Tasso; "his rancor gives me no pain. How much better is it that he should speak ill of me to the whole world than that all the world should speak ill of me to him." The traveler may see in the museum of Venice a machine by which a tyrant used to shoot poisoned needles at the objects of his hatred. The hateful instrument is not as much to be feared as the human mouth that hurls slanderous words. And the tyrant who used it is not so much to be despised as the slanderer.

There is a strange kind of fish caught off the coast of Cornwall, England; it is a huge sucker. It seems to have only one means of defending itself, which is to eject a great quantity of deep, black, viscous substance, which is about the consistency of treacle; the fluid is vile smelling, but it has no power to do harm. The same may be said of slander against defenders of righteousness.

As we read the daily papers we are often made to feel that there should be a reform started to reduce slander, if not to destroy it altogether. In early days in our country slandering was considered a capital offense; in the city of New York a man was condemned for slandering to be "stuck through the tongue with a red-hot iron, and banished from the province." We certainly do not recommend such methods, but we believe that some check should be put upon slanderers in newspapers, on the streets, in homes, and everywhere.

A Scotch minister rebuked one of his flock for her gossiping habit. It was in the days when a gentleman carried a "repeater." a watch which struck the hours and repeated the strokes on pressing a spring. "Janet," said the clergyman, "I have warned you often. Ye are ower muckle given to scandal. Ye maun keep your mouth as it were with bit and bridle, as the Scripture saith." "Aweel, minister," replied Janet, "sure I hae always keepit a watch upon my tongue." "Hoot, Janet! it maun hae been a repeater then!"

Some of us have perhaps seen a cat training her kittens to catch mice, but it is not likely we have seen a man-eating tigress training her whelps to eat men. Some years ago a tigress was killed in India, which caused much rejoicing because she was known as having given her whelps a live man to play with. She carried him from an open hut in the forest, where some wood choppers were sleeping. They were awakened and took refuge in trees, and saw her take the man to her whelps, waiting close by, and lay him down before them. As the man attempted to crawl away the whelps clung to his legs with teeth and claws, the tigress looking on and purring with pleasure. That domestic scene might be paralleled in some human habitations called homes. Dr. Banks has said: "A bloodthirsty tigress teaching her whelps to play with a live man and thus teaching them how to kill, is not an exaggerated illustration of the viciousness of a family brought up to gossip and evil speaking of their neighbors."

Peter the Great had an antidote for slandering, which ought to be passed along as being good for all people in all lands, in all times. When any one was speaking ill of another in his presence he would interrupt and say: "Well, no; but has he not a bright side? Come, tell me what you have noted as excellent in him. It is easy to splash mud; but I would rather help a man to keep his coat clean."

The slanderer, thus rebuked, generally subsides into silence, because it is not easy for a traducer to become a defender of the same person. We would help slanderers against themselves. We would also help others to bear slander, and in so doing the familiar advice of John Wesley is worth repeating: "The lie, the foul and false insinuation, which bad men use to destory the reputation of the good, is like mud. While it is wet, it sticks; but since to attempt to wash it out only spreads the stain, it is best to leave it alone and drying; in a short time it falls of itself."

A Hint for Dr. Eliot

I have been very much interested in letters published in the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (the Prime Minister among religious papers) concerning Dr. Eliot's "New Religion." The discussion reminds me of the story of the French philosopher a hundred years ago, who was approached by one of the "thinkers" of that era on the subject of the necessity of a "new religion" to take the place of Christianity, and which he purposed to inaugurate at once.

"Advise me," said he to the philosopher, "how I should proceed."

"The method is quite simple," replied the savant. "Proceed at once to do miracles, teach an incomparable philosophy of life, then get yourself crucified, and on the third day rise from the dead. Do this, and your new religion will be firmly established."

As I understand, the "thinker" failed to carry out this programme, but it may be possible that Dr. Eliot can do it.

The Multiplication of Power

There is no higher efficiency in the world than that of the American business man.

The multiplication of power in a business man—if he has the ability within him—depends upon the increased number of people whom he can, by personal contact, interest in his purposes.

He does this by telephone, and the multiplication of the telephone's usefulness depends on the increased number of persons whom he can reach.

In 1890 the Bell System had 200,000 subscribers' telephones in use. As late as 1899—ten years ago—it had only 500,000.

To-day it has 4,400,000—one for every twenty persons in this country—and is increasing at the rate of 500,000 a year.

Has the vast development of industries since 1890—the greatest period of advance in the world's history—when America has advanced faster than all the rest of the world, been the force that has built up this great, unified, efficient telephone service; or

Has the increased ability of the American business man to bring people to him from every locality, far and near, over the Bell Telephone System, been the cause of the multiplication of his power and his principality?

Whichever the cause and whichever the effect, the advancement of one is inseparably linked with the advancement of the other.

The business man's Bell Telephone, with its long distance and emergency advantages, is his most precious asset next to his capital itself.

The Bell Long Distance Telephone means as much to the home as it does to the office. It is the most marvelous convenience of modern times—if not all time—added to home life.

THE SOCIAL GLASS

I.

THEY may laugh at Prohibition, and may try to throw it down,
But I see it's gaining quite a hold in city and in town.
"Still," says my friend, "what matters a social glass or two?
It's really no man's business what another man may do.
There's more cheer in the wine-cup than these goody-goods can give,
When care and worry bother. I say, 'Live and let us live.'"

II.

"Now, friend," I said, "excuse me if I speak a word or two;
I'll tell a little story—you may think it is not true—
But I'll stand up to prove it, if you'll come down town with me,
For I am very different from the man I used to be.
I was lying in the gutter, scorned by all who chanced to pass;
Rags and filth composed my clothing—and all through your 'social glass.'

III.

"No, I do not blush to tell it—for I want it understood—
That this 'Prohibition' business isn't bad, but pretty good.
For the poor man 'tis the very best the civil law can do;
It will save him many a dollar, where he used to save but few.
'Tis the poor man that most suffers from the drink and what it brings.
Your rich fellows can waste money, but not so the underlings;
They must pinch each blessed penny that their heavy labor wrings.

IV.

"You can't tell me! I've been there—down along the Bowery way—
In the lowest dives they harbor I was drinking every day.
Oh, the wrecks of strong and cultured men that there I used to pass,
Brought down to the gates of Sheol—through your boasted 'social glass.'
And I know—because I've seen it—that, though hard to put in force,
A good law for Prohibition can't make matters any worse."

—JOSEPH MCDONALD.

"New Literary Valuations"*

IN this generous volume Professor Wilkinson talks of Howells; Matthew Arnold in two aspects—first as a critic, then as a man of letters; Tennyson, Stedman, Morley, Tolstoy; and, in an appendix, Alexander Smith's life drama.

In spite of Professor Wilkinson's enormous erudition and the wide extent of his reading, the perversity of his judgments must inevitably react unfavorably upon his reputation as a critic. Tolstoy's absurd reviews of the plays of Shakespeare are not more ridiculously beside the point than are Professor Wilkinson's strictures upon Matthew Arnold. One has only to read the comparison between the cases of the apostle Paul and Sampson Staniforth, as cited by Matthew Arnold and quoted by Professor Wilkinson (p. 120), to see how unfairly Arnold has been judged throughout. "Sohrab and Rustum (p. 150) is treated in the same minutely vivisectional manner. One is reminded of the famous attempt to analyze the soap-bubble. The traditional classroom manner, with all its cherishing of petty detail, is perhaps destined to dominate the schools forever, but it has no place in the broad treatment proper to the critical literary essay. Jeffrey, Christopher North, Lowell, and other masters of the rare art of transforming literary criticism into essays of light and leading, may well be imitated by our contemporary adventurers in this difficult field. The utter absence of a sense of humor in many of our college commentators deprives them of one necessary qualification for measuring values.

The high moral tone of Professor Wilkinson's book, and his keen perception of ethical values, may be set against the frequent unsoundness of his intellectual apothegms; though his failure to detect what many of our best critics consider the moral poison in certain of Tolstoy's works hardly bears out this assertion.

Bread Upon the Waters

and a wedding ring—and she had the books inscribed with John Vernon's name. Nothing could be easier than to establish Jessie's identity with the grandchild the old people had been seeking.

In due time this came to pass, and with the recovery of his daughter the dimmed memory was restored to the musician.

None of the party spent the year in Italy as they had intended, for so soon as Jessie knew that she had a father living she was eager to see him once more. She remembered him perfectly, and he beheld in her, not the forlorn little one in the attic room where her mother had died, but the image of the fair young girl he had courted.

The Scriptures say, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days." The proverb was verified in Edith Woolner's case. After the years she had spent in teaching little children, and when later her mother was taken from her, life became for her shadowy and sad. She did not wish to stay alone in her large house, nor did she feel strong enough to turn it into what she wished it might be, a rest home for convalescents and an asylum for destitute and friendless children. She was enthusiastic as ever in her desire to serve Christ and to scatter blessings in the path of those who are ready to perish, but her eyes had been overtaxed and she could not by herself search out the cases of those she longed to help. After the settlement of the estate, it was discovered that her provision for the future was smaller than her mother had supposed it would be. Then it was that Jessie Vernon and her kindred came to Edith's side, supplementing where they could and in every way possible assisting her to carry on Christ's work. Thus her bread upon the waters was borne back to her in rich measure.

Paul at Jerusalem

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PAUL, like his Master, steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem. Mnason, the old Cyprian disciple, traveled with them for the purpose of providing hospitality. Loving hospitality, granted ungrudgingly to Christian workers, is as much a part of the work of God as preaching a sermon; often far more, because the heart of Jesus is more manifest in it.

"And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly." This must have been a great encouragement to Paul; for he well knew how the Asiatic Jews had maligned him. The following day was appointed for a church synod; Paul and his company met with James and the elders. When Paul had saluted them, he told what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry. Nine years had elapsed since his last visit to Jerusalem. The wondrous spread of the truth in Asia and in Europe, and the manifestations of God's grace in overturning the power of heathenism, of intellectual philosophy, in healing the sick, and in establishing churches of believers wherever he had traveled—all this was enough to stir up praise and thanksgiving in their hearts to the Lord. They glorified God, but lost no time in telling Paul the reports of him which had reached them; and there was no little spice of policy in a proposition which they made him. "Thou seest, brother," they said, "how many thousands there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law."

This was characteristic of the Jerusalem Christians. They were not the less really Jews because they had become Christians, and they did not see how much of their ancient ritual had been fulfilled in Christ, as Paul shows them in the epistle to the Hebrews. But they were zealous of the law more than zealous for Christ. Otherwise many of them would have surely been led by the Holy Ghost to missionary work among the heathen. How many Christians are zealous of their church; zealous Churchmen, zealous Wesleyans, zealous Baptists, all rather than zealous missionaries!

"And they are informed of thee." Reports of Paul had got abroad. Reports of all Christian workers do get abroad; Satan takes care of that. When he cannot get God's witnesses into sin, he tries to ruin their characters by some calumny. He could not saddle on Paul any scandal on the ground of dishonesty or immorality, so he set people talking about what a bad Jew Paul was. "Why, he teaches all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs!" This was the accusation. The elders continued: "What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come. Do therefore this that we say to thee. We have four men which have a vow on them; them take and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law."

Paul did as he was desired; but in doing so he took a backward step. If he had proposed that the assembled company should put the whole matter into the hands of God the issue would have been different. The expedient was entirely unsuccessful; it was a mere human plan, and, as such, came to naught. Paul's enemies were on the alert; "certain Jews from Asia" (Acts 24:18) were busy circulating rumors, true and false, about him. The ostensible grounds of their accusations against him were very similar to those which we hear continually from the unspiritual members of a church toward those who follow the Spirit of God.

Questions and Answers

P. R., Providence, R. I. Did Dives have any love for his brethren when he made the request to send Lazarus to warn them, "lest they also come into this place of torment," as recorded in Luke 16:27, 28?

The passages referred to show the awakening of apprehensions, on the rich man's part, for his brethren. He felt that he had merited his own fate through his impenitence, and there was enough good in him to move him to try and help his kindred to escape a similar fate; but there was also in his appeal (verse 27) an implied reproach against God for not having given him sufficient warning. Doubtless his love for his friends was the prime cause of his solicitude.

D. M., Brooklyn. Has our English alphabet been the same for hundreds of years, or are some of the letters of comparatively recent addition? What was the last letter added?

The English alphabet was practically completed in the sixteenth century. The last letter added was J. It was distinguished from i by Dutch scholars in the first part of the sixteenth century, and was first printed in 1550 in Paris. It was not until about 1650 that j was used in all English books. The dot remains to show it came from the letter i.

O. B. F., Nevada, Mo. Please explain the Dispersion.

In the Old Testament sense "dispersion" is the general term applied to those Jews who remained settled in foreign lands after the return from the Babylonian exile. (See Josephus, Antiquities, book 12, chapter 13.) The people thus scattered were regarded as being shut out from the full privileges of the chosen race. They were distributed in Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Cyprus, Asia Minor and Greece. In the New Testament period, "dispersion" referred to that great body of Jews who lived outside of Palestine, scattered through the Gentile world, "yet still constituting one religiously united people, and looking to Jerusalem as their spiritual capital and the temple as their house of worship." The course of apostolic preaching followed the line of Jewish settlement in foreign lands, and the converts gathered at Pentecost represented each division of the Dispersion (Acts 2:9, 11). James and Peter wrote to the Jews of the Dispersion (James 1:1, I. Pet. 1:1). For Jewish history connected with the Dispersion read Josephus.

H. S., Watertown, Conn. What is this inheritance tax that there is so much said about lately, and to what use will the tax money be put?

It has been proposed that the general government levy a tax on all inheritances at the time an estate is settled. The amount has not been settled. The money would go toward meeting general government expenses. Several States already collect such a tax and are opposed to one by the general government, as it would be manifestly unfair to collect it twice.

Mrs. L. S. R., Glenham, N. Y. What are the "Elks," whose train was on the way to California, and met with an accident, a short time ago?

The order of Elks was founded in 1868, for benevolent, protective and social purposes. It has one grand lodge and 1,137 sub-lodges.

Mrs. G. W. D., Danville, Vt. What rule governs the spelling of "Douglass"? Does Douglass spelled with two ss denote Scotch ancestry and with one s Irish origin?

There is no rule for the spelling of proper names, only custom and usage. Usually Douglas is spelled with one s, though double ss is sometimes used. The later Scotch earls of the name used one s. When a man has inherited the name of Douglas it shows he is of Scotch ancestry, regardless of the way it is spelled. His family may have lived for generations in other countries, but they started from a Scotch source. The name in Gaelic means "the dark gray man."

Thomas G., Mora, Minn. What foods should be avoided, and what eaten, by those whose physicians advise abstinence from "starchy" food?

Starch is present in large quantities in many bulbs, tubers, fruits and seeds; such as potatoes, bananas, cereals and pulses. Arrowroot, sago, tapioca, maize, wheat and rice abound in starch. The laundry starches are principally made from rice and pulse. Food should be regarded from two standpoints: that of digestibility and that of nutrition. All people must have protein for the building and repair of the bodily machine, and fuel ingredients for warmth and work; but the proportions required of each differ according to age, sex, muscular activity, etc. Protein occurs in the nitrogenous compounds, as the lean of meat, the white of egg, the gluten of wheat. The fats are the chief source of heat, as the animal foods, butter and cheese. Nuts belong in this class also. Most of us eat too much. Read Hutchinson's Food and Principles of Dietetics, Thompson's Practical Dietetics, and Chittenden's Physiological Economy in Nutrition.

N. B. S., Farrenburg, Mo. 1. Explain Gen. 4:17, and tell where Cain's wife came from and who she was. 2. Is it a sin to join fraternal organizations?

1. The Bible narrative implies the existence of a considerable population in Cain's time. He feared lest he should be murdered in revenge for the killing of Abel (see verse 14). Adam's posterity may have increased, though none of the others are mentioned by name. One tradition calls Cain's wife Save and another Azura. 2. Not necessarily. Oath-bound, secret organizations, however, and especially if their object is merely conviviality, have no real reason for existence.

J. M., Dayton, O. What salary, or allowance, is paid to members of the royal house in England?

The King's privy purse is $550,000; household expenses, $965,000; to his servants, high and low, $629,000; Prince of Wales, $100,000; Princess of Wales, $50,000; five other princesses, $30,000 each; Duke of Connaught, $125,000. This is only a partial list.

P. S. G., Buffalo, N. Y. Please tell me if we are to take literally the statement in II. Tim. 3:16, "All Scripture is given by inspiration," etc.?

The better translation is in the Revised: "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching," etc.

R. S., Bucyrus, O. What is the "Symmes' Hole" theory of the Pole, which is referred to in the present polar discussion?

John C. Symmes, many years ago, propounded the theory that at the Pole there was a hole, which led to the earth's centre and to a great interior realm, which was populous and civilized. A few credulous souls believed him, but scientists generally regarded his notion as wildly imaginative.

Jersey Reader, Jersey City. Is it known how many people visit Coney Island, New York's famous resort, during the summer season?

It is conservatively estimated that at least 10,000,000 people visit it a year. Some place the figure higher.

E. W. B., Malden, Mass. Give me the name of the author of the saying "United we stand, divided we fall."

You give the quotation as ordinarily used, but the original statement was "By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall." It is from a speech by John Dickinson.

Miscellaneous

J. S., Boston, Mass. Write to Christian Missionary Alliance, New York City.

Mrs. T. A. U., Locust Valley, N. Y. The Unitarians reject the divinity of Christ.

Mrs. M. K. T., Santa Rosa, Calif. These questions have been dealt with in THE MAIL-BAG in previous issues.

Lena B., Edgewood, Ia. Christians should be charitable, and even generous, in their estimate of others. Judgment belongs to God alone. We have no right to pronounce condemnation on any one.

J. P. H., New Haven, Conn. Mass is said to have been first used by Clement I. (about 275 A.D.). For the complete history of the custom see any good Biblical Encyclopedia.

E. R. M., Truckee, Calif. The minister may have acted somewhat hastily, but a boy who whittles the seats, pinches other boys and makes a disturbance generally, deserves to be firmly dealt with. No doubt the minister has already tried moral suasion without success.

A. H. N., Des Moines, Ia. Uzziah was King of Judah from B.C. 810 to 758, beginning to reign at 16 years of age. It was toward the close of his reign that his profanation of the temple took place, but the date cannot be fixed.

M. T. B., Cumberland, N. M. We must be ready to forgive. The offender, however, should be willing to acknowledge his fault. His repentance may not be sincere, but we need not necessarily judge him; our willingness to forgive may be the means of reaching his better nature and making him sincere after all.

D., Waterloo, N. H. To understand the subject fairly, you should take the answer as a whole. The answer speaks of Christianity, and of no other religion, consequently queries concerning Mohammedanism, polygamy, etc., scarcely apply. The "liberty" referred to is the liberty to worship God without restraint or such compulsion and persecution as were so painfully illustrated in earlier times. This does not imply, however, encouragement or tolerance of error or irreligion.

D. R. D., Holland, Mich. 1. In Eastern lands, where the people wore sandals, footwashing before retiring was a general custom. To wash another's feet was to render the lowliest service. It was peculiar to the East. 2. Greeting each other with a holy kiss still prevails in the Oriental church. "It was understood (Fairbairn writes) that the kiss was to be exchanged between persons of the same sex only." It is not now the custom in the Western churches, having been long ago discontinued.

H. W., Seneca Falls, N. Y., writes: "I notice that a correspondent in THE MAIL-BAG (quoting Matt. 5:13) remarks that a chemist told him that salt never loses its savor. The chemist mentioned is evidently in error, as Maundrell, who visited the lake at Jebbul, tells that he found salt there which had entirely 'lost its savor,' and the same abounds among the debris at Modum, and in other localities of rock salt at the south end of the Dead Sea. It is a well-known fact that the salt of that country, if left long in contact with the ground, does become insipid and tasteless."

D. A. T., Mankato, Minn. Prosperity is given to man as a means to be used for God's glory and the benefit of humanity. If used otherwise, it ceases to be a blessing. Whether a man be in business or in private life, it is possible for him, if he be a Christian, to use his means rightly and to deal justly and generously with his fellow-men. The temptations to do wrong in business are many and powerful, and we do not underestimate them. It is no doubt often very difficult for a business man to square popular business methods with his conscience (as witness Christ's illustration of the camel and the needle's eye); yet that a man may be a good Christian and a successful man of affairs has been proved in thousands of instances.

Only Two More Days Left

IF you are planning to get Elsley's superb picture entitled "GOLDEN HOURS," described in last week's issue, you must bear in mind that October 1st is the very last date on which your list of 25 names may be mailed in order to comply with the conditions set forth in former issues.

We want to particularly impress upon our readers that this picture is the best and most valuable picture we have ever issued. Extra art paper has been used and the most skilful engravers employed in preparing for our readers this genuine work of art. It is quite an unusual thing to be able to secure permission to reproduce a work so celebrated and yet so new for this picture was painted by Mr. Elsley in 1908.

Before we decided upon its selection we had literally examined thousands of other pictures and finally determined that "Golden Hours" led them all.

We are more pleased than we can express that we were so fortunate in our choice and that the engravers succeeded so well in their work of reproduction.

The engraving measures 15 x 21 inches, and it is reproduced on heavy art paper, measuring 19 x 22 inches.

For the information of those who may have mislaid the issues containing the requirements under this offer, we repeat here the necessary details:

To every member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family who will send us a List of 25 Names of Adult Protestant Church or Sunday School Attendants (no two living in the same house), together with 10 cents in coin or stamps to cover the cost of postage, packing and handling, we will deliver FREE a superb reproduction of Elsley's world-famed picture,

"GOLDEN HOURS," measuring 19x22 Inches!

This List MUST BE MAILED ON OR BEFORE OCTOBER 1, and no other communication should be contained in the same envelope.

Thus you see that there are but a few days left in which to earn this wonderful picture, and prompt action on your part is absolutely necessary, as we will not accept Lists mailed later than the day stated.

Have you mailed your list? If not, do it To-day.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

TROPHIES OF THE CROSS IN INDIA

By CHARLES W. POSNETT

MEDAK, INDIA

IT was with some surprise that, in turning over my records the other day, I realized that eighteen out of twenty-five of your orphans were now evangelists and Bible-women. Already it has meant a great deal to us to have our own trained children out working in the villages, and as the time goes on the benefit will be even greater.

These are the young men and women who have qualified and are now laboring in the Master's vineyard:

Jella John....	Evangelist	Shikarmani	Evangelist
Sundram...	Bible woman	Andrew	Evangelist
Titus	Evangelist	O. Timothy...	Evangelist
Barnabas	Evangelist	P. Stephen...	Evangelist
Reuben	Evangelist	Kanna.....	Bible woman
C. Mark.....	Evangelist	Lydia.....	Bible woman
Christdas	Evangelist	B. Peter.....	Evangelist
Jella David..	Evangelist	Purushottam..	Evangelist
Jella Samuel..	Evangelist	T. Samuel....	Evangelist

The remaining seven of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans are: Gabriel, Nireechana and Sundari, at school; Vaidana-yakam, a domestic servant; K. David, a farmer; V. Daniel, a farmer, and B. Shanthe, a farmer's wife.

Looking over old ledgers is not always an inspiring piece of work, but to-day, as my eye fell upon receipts from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the famine of 1900, I paused and thought, What had God wrought? and the fuller meaning of "greater things than these shall ye do" came forcibly upon my mind. On that list were these twenty-five boys' and girls' names, eighteen of them now evangelists, Bible-women and teachers.

Yes, those hungry and destitute ones, who through you were fed during that famine, have become "soul winners," and now, as I look upon their lives, my mind runs back to the scenes by the Sea of Galilee, for with us, too, have the lives of His disciples been transformed—a hero out of a coward, an apostle of love out of a devil-priest, and a Bible-woman out of a village sorceress. The power of our glorified Saviour has been manifested to us through these lives, because of the love you so ungrudgingly showered upon them for so many years.

I look back on those years, and the memory of the burden that rested upon us seems once more to throw its dark shadows; but "hitherto hath the Lord blessed us," and as the command of the Master to feed the multitude was heard by you, so do we know that we shall not fail in enlisting your compassion for those who are still crowding, as of old, to get near the Master for the bread of life. Your readers have not given their gifts with a thought of any earthly reward, but God has given to them in the work that these evangelists and Bible-women are doing even in this life a hundredfold.

These young men and women whom they have fed and educated are now in villages, where, but for their witness, there would be none to show forth "the Light of the World" amidst the darkness of heathenism. Ninety villages have been won for Christ, but hundreds more are still without a teacher. Opportunities for further extension are opening up all around us. Our school buildings are over-crowded, and yet we dare not take the responsibility of receiving new converts into the Church of Christ and leave them unshepherded.

Only a short while ago, as our women doctors were touring from village to village, the following petition was placed in their hands:

"Being ladies who seek to do good work, we beseech you to grant us a teacher to instruct our children in Urdu and Telugu, and present you with this petition bearing the names of thirty-six caste families, who are desirous that their children should be taught the art of reading.

"You have come among us, and have given unto the sick; large numbers have come unto you, and are filled with gladness, and many have been healed.

"We rejoice that you have come into our midst. If you can send us a teacher for our children, we shall be grateful, and for this favor we pray.

"(Signed) by the chief men,

"THUJANAPURAM.

"Dated the 20th day of the Hindu year 1318, i. e., 1909."

Now, this does not mean that these thirty-six families wish to accept Christ. It only means that for the next five or six years we shall have the opportunity of teaching and influencing the children of these people Godward. These boys will be, before long, the rulers of many of the villages in our district. Like the centurion of old, they will say to this one, "Go, and he goeth, and to another, come, and he cometh." We have this opportunity and responsibility, and surely it is from channels such as these that God, from the seed that he has given us to sow, will expect his hundredfold.

We have already witnessed Christ's transforming power in the lives of some of these famine converts. The power of the Holy Spirit is still in our Church, and is placed at our disposal. May God the Father give us the desire to claim this power and to use it.

Our Church in India can only keep her conquests by ever marching on to fresh victories. If we cannot go on to win more villages for Christ, and to educate our children, we are bound to lose our vantage ground. Now, in the midst of success and with opportunities awaiting us on every hand, to stand still in the presence of the enemies of the Cross would be to court defeat. Only recently I heard a Mohammedan ruler say, "Wait a while and this Christian bubble will burst," and so it would if we could not go forward; but God is calling and Christ is beckoning to us to fulfil his last command, and we only wait for further co-operation to move on to greater triumphs.

The physical needs of the past are not to-day pressing upon us as they did five years ago; but a spiritual famine is with us, and is harder to contend with. Therefore we plead for your continued sympathy and help.

A SERMON BY

Rev. John Wesley Hill, D.D.*

THE SHADOWED SOUL

TEXT—Num. 32:23

"Be sure your sin will find you out."

WHEN Daniel Webster once said, in addressing a jury, "Crime is its own detective," he was only setting the words of our text in the light of universal history; for whether we go back to the declaration of Moses, or turn to this epigram of the great modern jurist, the truth is the same: sin will find the sinner out. It is the haunting spectre that will not down, the accusing voice that cannot be drowned in the "sound of revelry by night," the spot that will not out, "though sweetened by all the perfumes of Araba." It carries the principle of its own manifestation; it is a contagion that cannot be quarantined. This is as true as the law of cause and effect. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may ye also do good that are accustomed to do evil."

Sin is the most subtle and insinuating thing in the world. It insinuates itself so gradually and slowly into the habits and principles of men that they know not its power nor progress until the nature is so corrupted as to be capable of the darkest deeds. "If thou doest not well," saith the text, "sin coucheth at the door." The figure is that of a wild beast crouching to spring upon its unsuspecting prey. Its very presence means destruction. And it is true morally; when we allow some pet sin to crouch at the door of the heart, some indulgence of passion or appetite, some betrayal of a trust, some cherished revenge, that marks the beginning of moral destruction. It is the little sin that becomes great. The rivulets cut a way for the mountain cataract, and lo! a deluge; the snowflakes get frozen into avalanches, and lo! destruction. "This once only," pleads the world when the hour of devotion has arrived. "This once only," sings the siren when some place of sinful amusement opens its doors. "This once only," whispers appetite when the intoxicating glass is offered. Ah, "This once only!" What appalling sins and startling crimes have been inspired by it! "This once only" has made one man a tippler, another a drunkard, another a forger, another a thief, another a gambler, another a libertine.

The Body the Soul's Garment

Consider the transforming power of sin. Have you not witnessed the dismantling of a superb and promising intellect, the judgment unbalanced, the memory enfeebled, the will paralyzed, the imagination corrupted, the intellect transformed into a hideous monstrosity where nought but irreparable ruin proclaims the story of its past greatness? Sin will transform the body also. As the hands of a watch betray the movements within, so the countenance chronicles the moods of the soul. The fallen face is the sign of the foul spirit. Carlyle, in Sartor Resartus, pictures the world in clothes; its institutions and laws and fashions and houses revealing the inward life of the people. It is equally true that the body is the clothing of the soul. The garment of flesh is so frail that the soul shines through. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." The story is in the face. The effort to conceal is the act that reveals.

A man may wear many masks, but the real nature finds some rent or fissure in the flimsy disguise, through which it shows its hateful face. So true is this that men are not only known as sinners, but they are identified by their peculiar sins as well—the gambler, the drunkard, the miser, the glutton, the lewd and incontinent, the treacherous and dishonest, all carry their black trade-marks upon the brow! Nature, refusing to be a party to the transgression, sets her brand upon them. We have only to look into the face of a pure soul to behold the striking contrast. It carries a charm of which we never weary. We seem to look into fathomless depths of light, where no passion breaks the divine calm, nor trails a darkening shadow over the sunlit deep, and where no sin drops a foul blot into the crystal purity.

Sin will not only find the sinner out by its transforming power, but by the records of conscience as well. There is no more striking illustration of this than in the history of Joseph's brethren. They had every reason to think that Joseph was dead, and that their sin was buried in the grave. They had kept their guilty secret well. No person in Egypt, nor anywhere, knew what they had done, no person but themselves and Him to whom that higher self must always point. But listen to their communings: "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear. Therefore is this distress come upon us." Then Reuben answered them, saying, "Spake I not unto you, saying, do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear? Therefore, behold also his blood is required," as though they had actually killed him. Dead though he be to the rest of the world, Joseph was still alive to them. Long years had elapsed since then. These brothers had undergone the ordinary vicissitudes of life and had seen increasing families and increasing fortunes, but yet they had not lost their self-consciousness, not for a moment, or day, or hour. God had lifted Joseph from a pit to a throne, and engrafted an abode of his own into the house of Pharaoh, but his brethren had fallen into the bottomless pit of condemnation,. where the only light that illumined their darkness was the flash of the fiery scourges of an outraged and accusing conscience.

The Accusing Voice of Conscience

Men sometimes dream they are guilty of wrongdoing, that in a moment of weakness they yielded to strong temptation, but when the day breaks the delusion vanishes as the sun drives the mists up the mountain sides. They are still themselves, and not the victims of evil which they never committed. But let them accomplish the evil deed, let conscience make its registration respecting that deed, and they may wake or sleep; they may traverse sea and deserts, and bury themselves in the solitude of mountains; time may swing his pendulum and years may roll over their heads, but they cannot snap the chain of memory, break the mirror of self-recognition, or silence the mocking voice of conscience. They are shadowed! It is no longer like the mists of the morning, but like the sin of Judah; it is written with a pen of iron and the point of a diamond upon the tablets of the heart.

Not only will sin discover the sinner by the records of conscience, but by the records of nature as well. Scientists tell us now that every act, word and thought is accompanied by certain displacements of the particles of the brain, and that the record of all these movements is carefully preserved by the laws of nature. Dr. Ferrier declares that "each particle of the brain, receiving impressions from the outward or inward world, is as really modified and impressed as the sensitized plate of the photographer when an object is thrown upon it in the clear sunlight." This being true, the brain itself is a self-registering organ, containing the story of a lifetime. These impressions are not only made upon the brain, but also upon the heart. The motion of the heart is involuntary, yet its beat is not entirely unaffected by the action of the brain.

Our Every Word, Act and Thought Recorded

Dr. Richardson has said, "I believe that not a single external impression can be made upon the senses that is not conveyed to the heart and recorded upon it." It is little wonder that Jesus died so soon when he was lifted upon the cross. Not the spikes, nor the thorns, nor the spear accomplished his death. He died of a broken heart! Gethsemane, Calvary, and the sins of the world literally crushed it. But in the light of modern science we have at last learned that nature's records of human conduct are not confined to man's physical organism, but are transcribed upon the outer material universe. This is proven by the law of the conservation of force. The great tabernacle in Salt Lake City is a veritable whispering gallery. A whisper in one end of that vast structure is distinctly heard in the other. Science demonstrates that the universe is just such a gallery, only on an infinite scale. Its acoustic properties are perfect. Our thinking, speaking and acting are carried by the forces of light, heat and electricity to the uttermost limit of space, and no such limit has yet been discovered. How true the apostle's asseveration, "No man liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself." Eternity alone can reveal the cumulative story of human history. But science demonstrates that the universe is not only a whispering gallery, but it is a phonograph as well. It is the stereotyped foil upon which human thoughts and words are registered and preserved forever.

Again, our actions are immortalized by light. Photography is the achievement of the sunbeam. As we pass through this gallery of time we are undergoing a process of instantaneous photography, every look, attitude, gesticulation being impressed upon the waves of light and flashed upon the cloud curtain of eternity. What does this mean? Simply that our history is being written in light; that the rays continually departing from your every change of expression, form or posture, weave into the delicate texture of their flying pencils the consecutive history of your every action from your birth to your burial, from your first appearance upon the stage of time until you pass out of sight. This moment God's omniscient eye is flashing along the chain of your individual history, beginning with its ulterior and terminating where it interlinks with your last act. Oh, my brother, what kind of a history is He reading? Finally, sin will find the sinner out by exposing him before the judgment bar of Jesus Christ. Hear the word of the Lord: "Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the councils of the heart." Again, "God will bring every work into judgment with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil," secrets of thought, secrets of imagination, secrets of association, secrets of habit, secrets of desire, secrets of character, all will be brought into judgment. Are you ready? I know there are those in these modern days who dislike to hear these things, and who declare, "There is no judgment, no retribution, no hell." Modern thought cannot change eternal facts. Gravitation does not change. Thinking changes, but gravitation is the same.

Dangerous Delusions

I want you to look these great truths in the face, and instead of attempting to hide from them take them into account in the shaping of your lives. Suppose a man that lives in a land habitually shaken with earthquakes were to say, "I mean to ignore the fact. I am going to build a house just as if such things as earthquakes were delusions." What then? Why, his house toppling upon his head would soon proclaim his folly. Suppose a man upon the ice slopes of the Alps were to say, "I am going to ignore slipperiness and gravitation." He would soon find himself crushed and bleeding at the bottom of some precipice. And suppose a man says, "I do not believe in retribution; I do not believe in hell; and so I intend to eat, drink and be merry, and enjoy life." What saith the Psalmist? "I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay tree; yet he passed away, and lo! he was not; yea, I sought him and he could not be found." And what saith Christ, he who proclaimed himself "the way, the truth and the life"? "These shall go away into everlasting darkness." And what saith Paul, that mighty apostle to the Gentiles? "For it is appointed unto man once to die, and after this the judgment."

When this great audience is dismissed, some will go in one direction and some in another; but every road you take will converge at the judgment bar; and if we never meet again on earth, we shall all stand there in the day of days, under the searchlight of the divine knowledge and judgment! We cannot dodge God's detectives. They are on our track. He who in the beginning held a flaming mass on the anvil of his eternal purpose, and hammered it until every spark became a blazing world, will bring us into his presence, where "we shall give an account of the deeds done in the body," intentions, beliefs, principles, thoughts, affections, actions, imaginations, opportunities, good things, evil things, facilities, advantages, this service, this sermon. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; but know ye that for all these things God will bring you into judgment." Then amid the thunderings of the law, and the lightning flashes of justice, sin will find the sinner out by the infliction of its penalty; and instead of light there will be darkness, instead of hope there will be despair; and those who have persisted in sin shall at last be overtaken by its eternal retributions, and the doleful dirge of spiritual death will be heard ringing through the starless gloom: "The summer is ended, the harvest is past, and I am not saved!"

A SUNDAY SERVICE AT LEMON HILL PARK, WITH OVER 5,000 AUDITORS

PHILADELPHIA'S OPEN-AIR CHURCH

By MARGARET BODEN

OF all her possessions there is none of which Philadelphia is more justly proud than beautiful Fairmount Park. Near one of the city entrances to the park, and overlooking the picturesque river drive, is a gently sloping eminence known as Lemon Hill. Here stands one of the old houses—relic of Colonial days, gradually losing its old-time flavor—the "Mansion House," which was known fifty years ago as one of the greatest gambling and sporting resorts near the city. Even ten years ago, the Sabbath day was the signal for lawlessness and debauchery, until the Park Commission, unable to control the crowds with a detail of police, had decided to close the place.

In the spring of 1902 Rev. J. B. Ely, secretary of the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee of Philadelphia, had his attention called to the large music pavilion at Lemon Hill, with its seating capacity of fully 2,600. The attractiveness of the place suggested the possibility of a Sunday service. The Park Commission granted a consent to Dr. Ely to try the service on his own responsibility. Although at first it was feared that the audience would be unmanageable, it was soon found there was a sufficient number of Christian people to dominate any disturbing spirits. All this was seven years ago—the change is not wonderful, because it is God's work. The crowds still gather at Lemon Hill, but the policemen are absent. One guardian of the peace, in helmet and uniform, represents municipal law and order, but he finds his work in joining in the singing of hymns and enjoying the summer services. The Park Commission has spent over $30,000 in improvements to the old Mansion House, in better accommodations for the people and in new walks and drives.

On a Sabbath morning we meet a procession of tidy, orderly people, all pressing park-ward. Many are pushing baby carriages, filled partly with baby and partly with lunch basket, while the older children trail behind. Carriages are rolling along, too, for many who can read their title clear to family pews in the middle aisle prefer to attend the open-air service in the heated term.

Soon we come within sight of a beautiful knoll, and in the midst of trees is a large semi-circular pavilion, extending around the outer edge of which is a lobby some eight or ten feet in width, under canvas. At one side of the pavilion is a large stand for the musicians, who play in the free open-air concerts during the week, but occupied at the Sunday services by the large choir of 350 voices. A pulpit has been erected for Dr. Ely and his assistants, and there, on the first day of the week, he breaks the Bread of Life to the waiting multitudes. It would be hard to find a more democratic American audience anywhere. The invitation is given to "All creeds, all nations, all trades, all classes, all ages, all colors."

The services are non-sectarian. The truth of Christ, held in common by all Christians, is the attracting and unifying power. There is no collection taken. Another point Dr. Ely makes is that the services are not held with a view to seeking members for a church, but pouring out the truth into the heart of humanity, believing the results will be good even if they do not come the way our human hearts may wish.

Three thousand printed programmes, with hymns, Scripture lessons, and an incident or story illustrating the truth, are placed in the hands of the people. Little books, each containing one of the Gospels, are passed around. Hymns, with music, are printed on leaflets, which are distributed free. The first fifteen minutes of the service are occupied with earnest singing, led by a precentor, cornetist and chorus. After the song service, all stand and sing "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." Then follows a prayer of invocation, closing with the Lord's Prayer, all joining. Either the Scripture lesson is read, with the Gospel portions in the hands of the people, or verses of Scripture are recited by the people in the audience. The sermon is then preached, and the people are invited to ask for prayer. At the close, the chorus sings for fifteen minutes, while hundreds come forward to speak to the preacher, leave their gifts, or express interest in prayer for themselves or their friends. From one to three thousand people attend a single service. Crowds will sit from one to three hours singing the old hymns and listening to addresses. Some will stay all day, in order to be in the next meeting.

Over four hundred volunteer workers are enrolled as singers, visitors and ushers. Converts are immediately put to work. Over three hundred are enrolled as volunteer singers. Many of them come twice on Sunday to the services, at their own expense. Most of them are people employed in stores, factories or some trade during the week.

All gifts are purely voluntary. At an expense of about $6,000 a work can be carried on which, were it not for the pavilion being provided free and the large number of workers giving their time, would cost at least $15,000. It is done in the interest of no particular church, or institution, or individual. Dr. Ely takes great pleasure in personally arranging all-day services for special occasions, such as "Old Folks' Day," or the "Harvest Home" services, where it is estimated over 15,000 people were in attendance. There is another phase of the Lemon Hill work, which wields an influence possibly even greater than the Sunday services. This is the Children's Saturday Outings, under the care of a special sub-committee. One thousand children are taken from the congested districts of the city to Lemon Hill every Saturday during the summer, in trolley cars. About one hundred volunteer workers are required to gather the children and lead them in various games and sports. Each child is "tagged" for Lemon Hill; some are encumbered with smaller brothers and sisters, and wear a look of maternal anxiety. A number of the children had never seen grass, and wanted to eat it. Others had never seen nor tasted ice-cream, and great was their joy when, after an afternoon of good wholesome fun, each child was given a box of ice-cream. All assemble in the pavilion for a half hour of song and learning of Scripture verses before re-embarking in the special cars for home. The expense of all this is but $10 a car-load of 100 children. It is a great opportunity for Sabbath Schools and classes to act as hosts for one or more car-loads, and to experience the joy of bringing happiness into the lives of those who most need and appreciate it.

Last summer, the Presbyterian Church in Coatesville, Pa., raised $10 in its Sunday School for the Children's Saturday Outing. They gave the money, and sent two young men to personally visit the work. The young men had a practical study in missions that day. They went into the slum districts of the city, saw one hundred children collected and "tagged" for Lemon Hill, and went with them on the car their school had furnished. When they reached the park, they gave up their day to the care and entertainment of the little ones and their work was not over until they saw each child returned to its home. They returned to Coatsville, and at the next meeting gave a full report of their first day in the Home Mission field. "Even as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

A Natural Ice Mine

THE accompanying photograph shows an interior view of a cave known as the "Sweden Valley Ice Mine." It is located on a hillside, near the pleasant village of Sweden Valley, Pa. The curious feature of this ice cave is that the ice forms only during the hot, sultry days of summer, and begins to disappear on the approach of the early autumn frosts.

It is visited annually by a great number of people from nearly every State in the Union. It has also been examined by many expert scientists, and various theories have been advanced as to the cause of this strange phenomenon. C. M. SPOOR.

The Entrance to the Wonderful Ice Mine

A BEAUTIFUL CHRISTIAN LIFE ENDED

ON Wednesday, September 15, a cable message from Jerusalem brought intelligence of the death in that city of Mrs. Angeline E. Newman, widow of the late Bishop John P. Newman, of the Methodist Church. By the very large circle of friends in this country, who knew and loved Mrs. Newman, the news was received with genuine sorrow. Although she had passed her eightieth year, it was only lately that she gave evidence of the feebleness incident to old age, and her activity, sprightliness and cheerfulness were a surprise to all who knew her.

Few lives in modern times furnish a more beautiful example of consistent Christian womanhood and entire devotion to a high ideal than that of Mrs. Newman. When, as Angeline Ensign, she became the young wife of John Philip Newman—then a Methodist pastor giving promise of a brilliant future—she consecrated herself unreservedly to the arduous duties of a preacher's wife. Her bright mind and warm, sympathetic, spiritual nature were of the greatest assistance to her husband at every step of his long and famous career in the Methodist ministry. Bishop Newman rose to a position of commanding influence, and his name was known throughout the nation as a synonym for eloquence and splendid abilities. He was widely known as "General Grant's pastor," and he was at the bedside of the great soldier-President when the latter passed away at Mount McGregor. He was chaplain to three Congresses. In the "seventies," having been appointed by the President to inspect our American consulates in Asia, he traveled much, his constant companion being his faithful wife. Their wedded life was a most ideal one, with a perfect mutuality of interest in all that related to the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Mrs. Newman loved church work and had ample opportunity to cultivate an extensive acquaintance with its many aspects, both in the home field and in missionary lands.

After the death of Bishop Newman, who passed away at Saratoga on July 5, 1899, his widow devoted herself to the founding of what she hoped would be a memorial to his memory. She organized a Christian school and orphanage in Jerusalem, and made four journeys to the Holy City from America to give personal attention and supervision to the work. Some time previous to her last illness she had plans drawn for a Newman Memorial Church, and was in negotiation for the purchase of a very desirable site. It was her wish to have both church and orphanage endowed, and she labored unremittingly with this object in view. Although an octogenarian, the years sat lightly upon her. In a recent letter from Jerusalem to Mrs. Stephen Merritt —her lifetime friend—Mrs. Newman wrote: "My health is excellent and I have not had a day's illness in years. I was happy with the kindergarten little girls with me. I had to give them a vacation this year, on account of building. They are company, but a pleasurable care. You ought to be happy with your children around you, for they are your kith and kin." Again she wrote: "There is nothing impossible with the Omnipotent. Remember this when you pray for me and the work I am striving to accomplish, 'in His name.' My highest ambition is that I may have one soul as my trophy—one little child! The trial of my faith is that it takes so long and that the Church is so slow to give helpers to hasten the kingdom of Christ in the Holy Land. But as long as I am well I can afford to 'labor and to wait.'" In another letter from the Holy City she wrote: "I have just finished reading again the book of Job. I say to myself, 'What a wonderful character!' I cannot emulate the example of Esther, so I am trying to follow good old Job, as far as patience goes, though I cannot come up to him in perfection, but am simply endeavoring to let patience do its perfect work, casting not away my confidence, which has great recompense."

The Late Mrs. Angeline E. Newman

Mrs. Newman was a woman of great tenderness of heart, and her life was one of abundant charities. She visited those in prison, tended the sick, and even threw her home in Jerusalem open for the shelter of the poor and the destitute, providing comfortable quarters for them and with her own aged hands cooking and serving their food. Her friends protested against such acts, but the sweet-faced old Christian woman would simply smile and go on with her work of love. She was truly a good Samaritan, and she will be missed by many who had been for years constant recipients of her unfailing bounty.

Mrs. Newman's body will be brought to this country and interred beside that of her husband, in the family burying ground at Saratoga, N. Y.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

Admiral Seymour

Marquis de Villalobar

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL COLTON has just been appointed to the important post of Governor of Porto Rico, succeeding Regis H. Post, who has held the office since April, 1907. Colonel Colton has made a fine record for himself as a soldier, and as a Colonial official in the Philippines during some of the most turbulent days in those islands of unrest. The present more peaceful state of affairs there is due largely to the courage and ability of such officials as the new Governor of Porto Rico.

Colonel Colton went to the Philippines back in the stirring days of 1908-09, as the lieutenant-colonel of a Nebraska regiment of volunteers. After he had done his share of the fighting and the regiment was ordered home, Colonel Colton remained in the islands and became collector of customs in Iloilo. He later took the position of collector in Santo Domingo when the United States began to straighten out the financial affairs of that island republic. His task was difficult, but discharged to the satisfaction of the government at Washington. As a result he was sent back to the Philippines as collector of customs for the islands.

Recently, Colonel Colton has been in Washington, aiding in preparing the draft of the new Philippine tariff act. His parents live in Washington, and he considers it now as his home city. It was thought for a time that he would be made a judge of the new Customs Court of Appeals in Manila, a position created by the new tariff law, but a higher honor was in store for him.

The new Governor speaks Spanish like a native, and his wide experience in dealing with Spanish-American affairs will stand him in good stead in dealing with the many puzzling questions which are referred to the Governor of Porto Rico for decision.

JUST before President Taft started "to swing around the circle" on his Southern and Western tour, which will take him as far as Seattle, he appointed a Tariff Commission, composed of Mr. James B. Reynolds, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Professor Henry C. Emery, of Yale University, and Alvin H. Sanders, of Chicago, who is known throughout the Central and Western States as the editor of the Breeders' Gazette.

The board has the very important duty to perform, under the new tariff law, of assisting in the execution of that part which relates to the minimum and maximum tariffs. As a matter of fact, their duties will eventually cover a much larger field. The provision for having such a board was inserted as a result of numerous requests from all over the country that a board of experts be appointed to prepare a scientific tariff. The business men did not get all they asked for, but the commission is a step in that direction.

Mr. James Burton Reynolds has been the most in the public eye of the three appointed. Since 1905 he has been Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. He was born in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and graduated from Dartmouth. He entered newspaper work, and passed through the various grades from reporter to editor. He became interested in politics about thirteen years ago. At present he is actively engaged in interpreting the various tariff schedules for the customs collectors at the various ports.

Professor Emery, of Yale, is a teacher of political economy. He is a graduate of Bowdoin, and has given all his time to the study of economics. He is the holder of many honorary degrees from both European and American universities. Alvin H. Sanders is an expert on agricultural conditions in the Western States.

AMERICA has taken for many of her cities the names of places famous in the Old World, in addition to using many euphonious designations of Indian origin. A large part of the towns of New England are named after the places in old England from which the early settlers came. New York State seemed to have read the classics and used Roman and Greek names, as Rome, Utica, Athens, and others bear witness. The States farther West have taken them fro everywhere. Toledo, O., has the name of an old Spanish city, and at a recent celebration the new Spanish Ambassador, Marquis de Villalobar, was present as representative of the King of Spain for that occasion. The Ambassador is already in demand as a speaker and guest at various gatherings, and seems likely to become one of the most popular members of the diplomatic corps in Washington. America is recognized as one of the most desirable posts, and European governments are selecting the best men at their command to represent their interests. Spain's Ambassador has had a long experience at European courts, and has expressed great gratification that he will be stationed in this country.

GREAT BRITAIN has paid us a particular compliment in sending with her fleet to the Hudson-Fulton Celebration Admiral Seymour, one of her brightest naval officers, known wherever sailors tread a deck or sight a gun. Generally officers of such high rank do not go far from their usual stations, unless in some great emergency. The admiral's men will participate in the naval parade and in the great land parade in New York.

Boston's Open-Air Gospel Campaign

A GREAT AUDIENCE OF MANY THOUSANDS LISTENING TO THE GOSPEL ON THE LYNN BALL GROUNDS

Lawrence B. Greenwood

A SIMULTANEOUS campaign in church work has proven a success in Boston, but it was not until this present season that anything in the line of a summer campaign had been tried. Immediately after the Chapman meetings, the Evangelical Alliance engaged the services of Mr. Lawrence Greenwood, evangelist, to extend and superintend an aggressive open-air campaign. The rapidity with which the work has grown and the attention it has secured have been most gratifying to the workers.

Last year several open-air centres were cared for by Mr. D. A. MacPhie, the general secretary of the Alliance; this year the number was increased to twenty, besides tents which have been located in eight different places. Greater Boston is a city specially favorably built for such a movement, owing to the large number of separate municipalities adjacent to the city proper.

One of the delightful elements in the movement has been the ready response it has met by the pastors, many of whom have been ready on call to speak anywhere. Besides this, the work has developed a good many laymen, candy-makers, printers, shoemakers, newspaper men and others, who are wholly competent to conduct a meeting from beginning to end.

Several of the Gospel workers conduct two meetings a day, while three of them, after working all day, on alternate nights conduct the late meeting in Pemberton Square. This centre rivals Boston Common as a centre for spellbinders; its Socialists, Mormons and others follow one another from seven o'clock till ten, when the Alliance begins its service, which often runs till midnight and is pervaded by a deep spiritual interest.

In the notorious West End it is a great thing to have such a meeting, as is seen by the striking conversions that have there taken place.

Another meeting of great interest has been the open-air meeting held four days a week at Fort Hill Square, where Mr. Greenwood has spoken almost daily for three months. Here hundreds have listened, of all classes, fully one hundred and fifty being at the meeting the hottest and most sweltering day of the season, when the thermometer stood at 106.

Services have been held in three different ball parks, with hundreds in attendance. A tent on Ruggles Street has been opened for the colored people and is doing splendid work in the hands of Rev. D. Samuel Orner.

The practical value of Gospel pictures has been seen this summer, the people fairly flocking to see them and hear the Gospel sung and spoken, not only in the tent but in the open air. Plans are now maturing to cover the city with automobiles, each one carrying four workers and covering three places in one evening, a different speaker addressing each meeting and remaining with his own meeting when advisable, as the automobile goes to some other place for its next appointment.

The Boston summer campaign this year has demonstrated the great willingness of the laymen to enter aggressive movements, people almost a hundred miles away having sent to secure workers, or plans for carrying on such work in their location; and also that Boston, with its fads and "isms," still has a heart and ear for the grand old Gospel of Jesus Christ, "which is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth."

Preaching to the Crowds at Magazine Beach

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., opened their fall evangelistic campaign in the First Methodist Church, Oklahoma City, Okla., with pastor Dr. W. H. Burch, on September 25.

—MISSIONARY J. P. LANE, who has been conducting evangelistic services at Gallatin, Tex., held a revival meeting there in which several professed Christ and joined the church. He is connected with the American Sunday School Union.

—REV. J. M. FARRAR, of Brooklyn, N. Y., writing from Stony Brook, L. I., says of a recent visit to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn: "Thanks for your kind words concerning my address at Mont-Lawn. I have put Sunday, September 5, down as one of the special red letter, gilt-edged days of my life. You must be happy."

—REV. R. HARRIS LLOYD, superintendent of the South-West London Wesleyan Mission, London, England, during his recent tour in the United States and Canada related some touching incidents concerning slum life in South London. This district is included in the work of the South-West London Mission. Vauxhall, once the fashionable part of London, is now covered with slums and tenements. "We went in front of a saloon," he said, "and began singing, and soon crowds of people were flocking around us. The door of the saloon flew open and a young man rushed out and forced his way through the crowd to where I was standing. At the conclusion of the hymn 'When I Survey the Wondrous Cross' he said: 'Why did you sing that hymn? I am the son of a Baptist minister and a good Christian mother. But I broke my mother's heart. The last time I sat in the pew with her listening to father, he gave out that hymn. While they were singing it he was stricken with apoplexy and died in the pulpit. As I stood at the bar drinking I heard you sing other hymns, but they made no impression on me. But when you began to sing that hymn I could stand it no longer.' That young man was brought to Christ, and seven months afterward was preaching the Gospel and winning souls."

—REV. E. O. GUERRANT, president of the Soul Winners' League, writes us that he will visit New York this fall and will be prepared to deliver a few lectures on the "American Highlanders, Their Character, Country and Condition," illustrating the same with stereopticon views. Churches, church societies, Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A.'s can address him at Wilmore, Ky., for all information.

—MISSIONARY G. W. VERITY, of Tai An Fu, China, writes of his mission station: "This is the most densely populated province in China, and probably the most densely populated section in the world. Shan Tung province is one and one-third times as large as New York State, yet it has as many people as there are in the United States east of Chicago, viz., 38,000,000, or 683 to the square mile. Our district is 100 miles square, right in the centre of this mass, with 6,000,000 souls." He appeals for funds to enable the missionaries to scatter broadcast Christian tracts and placards in that great populous section of the heathen world.

—A YOUNG MAN of executive ability, who has been trained for and has had much experience in modern and humane methods of juvenile institutional work, desires the supervision of a boys' department, or superintending of orphanage or other institution. He is competent to take full charge of military drill and physical training, as well as having oversight after school hours. Location immaterial. For the past summer he has had charge of the boys' department at Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home. Address W. S., care THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

—BERTHA V. DEADERICK, a missionary to the Mojave Indians at El-Bethel Mission, Needles, Calif., writes to this paper that many of these Indians are in a condition approaching destitution. Fully one hundred of the aged are sick, blind and infirm, and in need of food. Any gifts sent to her will be used in purchasing flour, beans and medicines. Our government has helped the Mojaves slightly, but the need is urgent. Some of these Indians have become good Christians. Miss Deaderick will answer any inquiries.

—SPEAKING OF THE CONDITION of General Booth, the aged founder of the Salvation Army, one of his physicians in London lately said: "The general's heart is that of a young man of twenty, and as for his pulse it is that of a child. It is the admiration of the doctors." He has suffered terribly from an abscess in the left eye, the sight of which is gone forever, but he can see with the right eye without glasses. He never felt better in his life than now. His mind is busy with new schemes and projects.

—ABOUT TEN YEARS ago the Darjeeling disaster occurred in India, through which Rev. and Mrs. D. H. Lee, two consecrated workers, suffered the loss of their six children. The sympathy of the world was aroused, and as a result there stands to-day, nearly completed, a fine building, known as the Lee Memorial Building, destined to shelter three hundred Bengali girls and their teachers. This gigantic monument to the memory of these dear children has involved the labor of many of those who were once "CHRISTIAN HERALD orphan boys," but who have since become self-supporting masons, carpenters and bricklayers. It is hoped that the entire building may be dedicated by January 1, 1910. Two things are lacking to complete the plans: a special prayer-room and study, and light and water installation for the main building. Either one will cost about $1,000. When these are provided the monument will be complete. Any contributions in aid of this work will be welcomed.

The Men of the Future

THE men of the future are the boys of to-day. The men who are sitting in presidential chairs, ruling empires, commanding armies, doing in one or another way the work of the world were, fifty years ago or forty or thirty years ago, little children under the care of fathers and mothers, were lads in the schoolroom, and were in training for the positions they now fill. If they were American boys, they no more dreamed of the eminence to which they would attain and of the responsibilities they are now carrying than did Lincoln or Washington in boyhood.

Martin Luther's teacher, in a day of rigid methods and stern penalties in the schoolroom, always took off his hat to his pupils. Asked why he did so, the wise man said his homage was rendered, not to the boys of the hour, but to the statesmen, counselors, scholars and leaders they would be in coming days. The men of the future are in our homes and schools in 1909. We who are parents cannot foresee to what destinies our children are born. All that we can do is to trust in God, set good examples, surround our children with a wholesome atmosphere, and exact from them performance of each simple duty as a matter of course. The mother who fosters in her boy an indolent love of ease is unfitting him for serious tasks by and by. The father who foolishly permits his boy to expect needless luxuries, forgetting the obstacles he himself overcame, may yet reap a harvest of disappointment.

Plain living and high thinking are still in fashion in many portions of the republic. For the sake of the men of the future they should be universal.

A Well-Rounded Life

LIKE a shock of corn, fully ripe, Mrs. Newman came to her end. The poet has written of the horrors of death as it stalks "in ghastly form" beside the bride, the young mother, the earthquake-stricken, those full of the joy of early life; but to the hero whose "sword has won the battle for the free," the summons rings out as "a prophet's word," which "holds the thanks of millions yet to be."

Thus it comes to the soldier of Christ, who lays down his armor after the long struggle is over. Thus it came to Bishop Newman a decade ago; and thus now it comes to his consecrated helpmeet, who fought side by side with him so bravely and so long, and who has continued faithful to him and to the great cause during the lonely years since he departed.

We feel sick at heart when one dies whose promising career was left unfinished; or when in darkness goes out the candle which should have gone on in light; but for one taken in fulness of labor, at the day's close, with a song on the lips and faith in the heart, there is only the feeling of joy that the time has come for the crown after the long cross-bearing.

As this saintly woman upheld for many years the hands of her famous husband, with no thought of self-seeking, so thousands of loving wives and mothers and sisters have spent themselves for the men they loved. Think of Herschel and his sister; Charles and Mary Lamb; Robert and Clara Schumann; Renan and his sister; M. and Mme Curie; Robert and Elizabeth Browning; and the many others recorded and unrecorded. These women, as a rule, desired no fame for themselves, but only for the men they held dear. It is the true womanly spirit, the eternal feminine, as the greatest German poet has so beautifully said, which ever beckons upward and onward.

Such was the revered woman who has just passed on to the spirit world. The journey is done for her, and the summit attained. Earth is poorer, but heaven is richer; and it is well.

A National Duty

IT is due doubtless to the barriers created by the recent disastrous floods that the outside world has not learned till now of the actual condition of affairs in and around Monterey, in the province of Nuevo Leon, northern Mexico. Now that the awful nature of the calamity is apparent, when valleys and hillsides are heaped with dead and when tens of thousands are appealing for food and shelter, America's generous heart should respond by sending the needed help liberally and promptly.

Mexico is our friend and our nearest neighbor in the sisterhood of Western republics. It is our duty as a nation to help these people, and it should not be shirked by any one who can afford to help, be it in ever so small a measure, under the excuse that assistance will be forthcoming from some other source. Thousands of helpless men and women and children are face to face with death from famine and exposure; they have hardly a rag to cover them, and they are sleeping on the water-soaked ground or among the rocks of the mountain gorges, and not one in a hundred can tell from day to day where they will be able to find other food than the roots to which they have been compelled to resort in order to keep alive. Heart-rending scenes are being enacted to-day in northern Mexico, and it is a pitiful cry which has come North over the border.

America has gained a great reputation for Christian generosity in Europe and Asia in time of flood, famine and earthquake. As our first duty is to those nearest home, the response should be not only as spontaneous and cheerful as when aid was given to India, China, and more recently to Italy, but even more so. Judging by the magnificent response of the national heart in past emergencies, the next few days will undoubtedly see a marked change in the size of the American relief fund. Our people only need to know that the need is real and urgent to show their sympathy in a practical way.

We as a nation should act promptly or we will have hereafter a feeling of regret that such an opportunity for strengthening the bonds between Mexico and the United States was neglected.

Chambers of Commerce, churches and Sunday Schools should form committees to gather contributions and propose plans to assist the sufferers until another crop season arrives. Read the graphic and accurate description of present conditions by Editor Russell, of the San Antonio Express, on another page. After reading it, send in your contribution to the Mexican Relief Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

The Value of the Minutes

MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE, who certainly appears to get as much out of life as most rich men—and a great deal more than most of his millionaire contemporaries—in public service and substantial satisfaction, is credited with a characteristic utterance recently, which from any less philosophic lips would have sounded grotesque. "I would give two hundred millions of dollars for a lease on this life," said he; "and I am not greedy, either, for I would give it for ten years only!"

This is a tremendous price to offer for anything within human reach or control—a perfectly fabulous figure. But there is the difficulty—our life is not in our keeping, and there never yet lived a human being who held a guarantee of release from the mortgage which death holds on the race. So, when Mr. Carnegie, who is now nearing the close of a long and active career, wishes to impress the thoughtful men and women of America, and especially the rising generation, with his estimate of the value of time and opportunity, he says in effect that he would give all of his wealth to enjoy another ten years of usefulness. Two hundred million dollars, surrendered as premium for 3,650 days of assured existence, is at the rate of $1,666,666 per month, $400,000 for every week, $55,555 for each day, $2,318 per hour and $40 for each and every minute!

Love of life, or vitativeness, is implanted in every human being by nature. But it is neither the love of life for the mere sake of living, nor is it the dread of death that has inspired Mr. Carnegie's utterance. He knows that life cannot be bought nor death bribed. He knows, as all do, Christian or pagan, that here we have no abiding-place, but are sojourners, who are sacredly bound to do the best we can, with divine help, to make our brief stay a period of serviceable experience and of training for the greater life beyond. All life means development, work, service; and it is only as we near the end of our little journey that we begin to get the true perspective and comprehend the right values of the things about us. Just as the transitoriness of this stage of existence becomes most apparent, so do we realize most the well-nigh boundless opportunities of service which a few more years would afford us.

If Mr. Carnegie's words do no more, they convey a powerful lesson, especially to the young, concerning the value of time, and the wickedness of wasting golden opportunities that should be utilized for our own development and for the benefit of the race.

Our New Serial

AMONG those who contribute to the support of our city missions are occasionally found certain inexperienced ones, who "wish that they knew just how the money was spent." Others refuse to contribute because they are sceptical regarding the usefulness of such missions. Both of these classes will be enlightened by the brief serial story, "Midnight Callers," which will begin in our issue of next week. From a wide knowledge of missions and mission work Mrs. Alden, better known to American readers everywhere as "Pansy," has drawn the incidents upon which this tale is founded, and she has presented them with the skill and effectiveness acquired by long practice in writing. We congratulate our readers upon the pleasure and profit in store for them in the perusal of this strong and vivid story.

GENERAL NOTES

—IN A RECENT ADDRESS President Taft said that a permanent fund for worn-out preachers would be an admirable benefaction." It certainly would be a wise thing for each denomination to make such a provision. Of the 160,000 preachers in this country a very large proportion are underpaid. The time will come when many of these faithful workers, stricken by age and infirmity, will feel the pinch of poverty. Few denominations make any substantial showing of support for their aged pastors. The President no doubt had in mind a general movement among the churches, with this object in view.

—THE PEARY-COOK dispute over the discovery of the Pole thus far seems to be somewhat one-sided. While Peary has been making charges, Cook has remained silent, simply intimating that he would await the judgment of the scientists who are to examine the journals of the two explorers. One of the arguments advanced against Dr. Cook was that he had no white witness to his conquest of the Pole and that the two Eskimos who accompanied him could not be accepted as competent witnesses. It now turns out that Commander Peary had not a white witness when he raised the flag at the Pole—the only persons present being a negro and two or three Eskimos.

—JAMES J. HILL, president of the Great Northern Railroad, has been giving the Chicago bankers some excellent advice. At a recent convention, held in that city, Mr. Hill spoke on the "Farm and Its Relationship to National Prosperity." He said, among other things: "The idea that we feed the world is being corrected; and unless we can increase the agricultural population and their product the question of a source of food supply at home will soon supersede the question of a market for our own products abroad. The farm is our main reliance. Every other activity depends on that. The farms of this country are now adding annually $8,000,000,000 to the total of our assets; a total which represents value actually created out of elemental things. The farm is the mother of every other form of human industry. Our tillable area may be made to support millions of people greatly multiplied after the last bit of mineral has been extracted from the earth, and man's ingenuity in fashioning tools and fabrics has passed its limit. There is no comparison, in volume, in value and in relation to human life, between the cultivation of the soil and any other occupation."

Germany May Secure Holy Sepulchre

ACCORDING to Young Turk representatives in Paris, their party is very anxious to secure permanent peace with the outside world. They realize what difficulties have arisen between them and the Christian nations on account of the religious fanaticism and massacres which have disgraced their country. Although the Young Turks deny any responsibility for the recent massacres of Christians, and insist that they have done all in their power to prevent them and to bring to punishment those who have been guilty of them, they recognize that the Christian nations feel aggrieved over past Turkish excesses. A part of their programme for the removal of religious difficulties is the disposal of what is known as the domain of the Holy Sepulchre and the adjacent property to Germany, whose interest in Jerusalem is shown by many external signs there. Some time ago, Turkey gave to Germany the Church of St. John, a famous church of the time of the Crusaders, and now it is proposed that the magnificent Church of the Holy Sepulchre and its grounds shall be transferred to the same nation. This Church of the Holy Sepulchre is one of the most memorable in the world. It is very near the Latin Convent, and rests upon the site of the great church erected by Constantine, which was destroyed. Its area is about 300 feet in length by an irregular breadth. It has been beautified from time to time by the gifts of many nations—Roman and Greek Catholics, Syrians, Armenians, and Protestants of all kinds. While the Turkish soldiers guard it, almost every conceivable Christian body is permitted to hold religious services within its sacred precincts, priests of the Catholic and ministers of the Protestant denominations having their services in turn. It is claimed that this most famous church in the world rests upon the actual spot where Christ was buried. The traditions of over 1,800 years insist that this is the fact, and yet it is not likely that the claim is well founded. It is not likely that the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea has been located. It makes no difference whether the location of this structure is the place where Christ was buried or not. It is not the material stones of Joseph's sepulchre that made it of any value, but their sacred association with the "open tomb." On the crucified and risen Christ is built every church of any importance on the earth. It is because the Church of the Holy Sepulchre has this foundation that it has won its world-wide significance and has led to the practical proposition of letting Germany have it as the price of national or international peace. Christ coming out of the Holy Sepulchre and the churches builded upon him and his finished work are the best guarantee of the world's liberty and love.

He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. (Matt. 28 : 6.)

Name of Kalamazoo Breaks His Heart

In 1821 Titus Bronson walked from Detroit to a place on the east bank of the Kalamazoo River. He staked out a claim, built a cabin, and returned to New York State. The next spring he returned to his cabin, accompanied by several families. Other settlers followed Bronson and his friends, making quite a settlement. The village grew and the founder called it Bronson, after himself. It grew larger, and the newcomers, not liking the name its founder had given it, decided to call the place Kalamazoo, the Indian name for the river. Permission was obtained from the State to make the change. Bronson was grief-stricken over the action of the State, and soon after left the village. It is reported that, aged and broken by disappointment at the change of name, he died of a broken heart.

This old gentleman had cause for disappointment, but its intensity was unwarranted. Deaths from disappointed ambition in the United States are without number. How many disappointed candidates for the Presidency of the United States have died of broken hearts! The standards of life are too low when there are these excesses of disappointment. To live the life of highest thought and noblest truth is a worthy ambition, but greed for the praises and plumes of the world is unbecoming the highest type of man. Besides, there is a life of faith in Christ which is a cure for all the sorrows and disappointments of this life.

He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted. (Luke 4:18.)

Found Eight Thousand Dollars

William Malloney, an humble farmer, residing three miles north of Waterloo, N. Y., was remodeling an old mantelpiece in his home the other day, and in making a hole in the chimney he discovered an old tin box, which contained $8,000 in bills of a large denomination. Malloney bought the farm of an eccentric man named Lafayette Burnett, about two years ago. Burnett had no faith in banks, but trusted the chimney. He did not take death into account, and was carried away recently without the sense or opportunity to reveal the location of his hidden treasure.

In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, Jerusalem

The world will universally say Malloney had a streak of good luck. This is a question, for Malloney on the discovery of his treasure immediately vanished, and no trace of him has as yet been discovered. He may have fled, thinking that the heirs of Burnett would demand the money; he may have concluded that his fortune was made and he would quit work. Whatever prompted him to leave, his discovery was a curse if it led him to cherish a feeling ofdishonesty, or if it became a temptation to indolence. There is but one real way to get money, and that is by giving some service of body, mind or soul. The short cut to money by way of the hole in the chimney wall, which has imitators in a thousand devious paths of human endeavor, is a curse and not a blessing.

Provide things honest in the sight of all men. (Rom. 12 : 17.)

The Lazy Bug

There is a disease caused by the lazy bug in Puerto Rico which the medical world thought was confined to that locality, but careful investigations have revealed the fact that a similar disease, though not quite so virulent, produced by the same cause, has afflicted the people of our Southern States for many years, and is doing so now. It has been common to speak of the negroes and "poor whites" of the South as lazy when, to a large extent, they are simply diseased. An expert recently estimated that there were in the South 2,000,000 persons, mostly adults, suffering from this disease. It is propagated by the so-called hook-worm, and the bacillus has been segregated. Fortunately it is easily amenable to treatment and it is hoped it may be abolished entirely. It is found that a large proportion of the Southern recruits in the United States Army are suffering from the disease and have, for the most part, been cured. The disease, in its general aspects, is something like the "sleeping sickness" of Africa in that it produces a state of torpor from which it is impossible to arouse the sufferer until the poison is removed from the blood.

It is not likely that all of the indolent people in the South or North have been bitten by the lazy bug, and yet much that has been called laziness in the South has been, as the physicians have shown, the result of a disease. People of weak lungs, or poor digestion, or shattered nervous systems, or suffering from other ills, who do not keep up with the pace and do what is counted their share of life's hard work are considered trifling, and unjustly so. They have not the physical stamina to do the work, and should not be criticised. The rebukes ought to be retained for the people who have the strength and are too lazy to use it. The hook-worm of sin has attacked the stoul and it has lost its energy and sunk into a slumber, which only the divine remedy can cure and which the divine voice alone can break. The Scriptures refer to the slumber of the soul caused by sin.

It is high time to awake out of sleep. (Rom. 13:11.)

A Jew Favors Revivals

About the same time that the people of this country were celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of Hudson's discovery the Jews were observing their annual holy days, which date back to certain laws prescribing them three to four thousand years ago. After the ten days of celebration came the Day of Atonement and then the Feast of Tabernacles. One million loyal Jews in New York City alone engaged in these celebrations. These special religious seasons are the occasion of articles from distinguished Hebrews, showing the keenest mental penetration and the deepest spiritual insight. Dr. H. G. Enelow, in his Hebrew weekly journal The Temple, in an article on revivals, among other things says: "Revivals and conversions are part not only of the Christian religion, but of every other true religion or spiritual system. Indeed, the historical student will have no trouble in tracing the Christian custom and teaching back to Jewish origin. Nor is this phase of the religious life anything to be ashamed of, or superfluous, or out of harmony with modern insight or idealism. The true psychologist will admit its high value. A revival is an effort to stir up the dormant religious forces of the people. A conversion is an awakening of the soul of the individual, the sudden flickering up of the divine life within it in its sudden response to the call of God. A book, a conversation, a sermon, an illness, a sublime scene of nature, any experience that stirs up the depths of the soul may be the cause of such a conversion, which means the sudden realization of God on the part of the human soul and response to his call. That such conversions daily take place we all know. Their worth cannot be exaggerated. It is a mistake to deny them. It is foolish to sneer at them." There are orthodox ministers of the Gospel who do not care for revivals of religion and who really object to them. There are some so-called revivals that are spurious, and ought to be condemned. But genuine revivals of divine origin are the law of human nature and of the growth of the Christian Church. There are some evangelical people who think that the day of successful revivals is past. They are mistaken, and it will be well for them to take notice of the view of the Jewish editor on the subject. The Christian conversion means more than that of the Jew, as Christ means more than Moses; and yet the Jewish editor in his views on the subject goes a long way toward Christian truth, as Moses in his essential goes a long way toward Christ.

Repent ye therefore, and be converted. (Acts 3 : 19.)

MEXICO'S APPEAL FOR HELP

Over 13,000 Drowned in Flood

IT must be that the extent of the terrible disaster that has overtaken our neighbors in northern Mexico, beginning with the flood at Monterey and ending with the tidal wave that has blotted out the town of Soto la Marina and contiguous towns, is not realized or appreciated by the charitable people of this country. Otherwise it is inconceivable that they would have turned a deaf ear to the appeals for aid that have gone out for this stricken people. Probably no disaster of modern times has been so quick and terrible in its results or has left the surviving populace in a more pitiable condition of starvation and want.

According to the most reliable data that the San Antonio Express has been able to gather, the dead will number from 12,000 to 15,000 and the homeless, destitute and starving as many more, in a territory extending from Monterey to Matamoras, a distance of about 150 miles.

In this territory, where the means of communication with the outside world are limited, and where the people lived in the valleys by agriculture and stock-raising, the waters from the Monterey flood have swept down the valleys from 20 to 60 feet deep, sweeping everything before them and driving the survivors to the hills, where they have been kept prisoners for days without supplies of any kind.

The flood-swept country is in an almost inaccessible condition, and the survivors, who belong largely to the poorest class in the country, are absolutely without food or clothing or shelter of any kind, with their homes and all their earthly possessions washed into the sea.

The few railroads that penetrate this country have been rendered useless for travel by the tons of débris that have been piled upon them and the tracks and bridges have been washed out, so that it is probably a question of weeks before full operations can be resumed. In the meantime, the people are absolutely without supplies, their animals have been drowned and they have no means of reaching the centres of population, which are far distant and inaccessible to them, to seek aid, and if not succored thus must inevitably starve. In fact, every day's delay means starvation to hundreds of them.

What they need first is immediate succor, and afterward they will need assistance in re-establishing their homes and in carrying them through the coming winter until another crop season.

Immediate Assistance Needed

It will be apparent from this statement of the facts that relief to these people, to be effective, must continue throughout the coming winter, and must be on a scale entirely beyond anything that is in sight at the present moment.

I would suggest that relief, in order to be effective, should take the form, first, of a cash contribution, that would enable the outfitting at the nearest railroad points of relief trains loaded with provisions and clothing and necessary supplies for the people whose homes have been destroyed, in order that the actual starvation of these people may be averted. In the second place, organization should be effected that would result in bringing regular supplies to supplement the first relief and that will carry the destitute through the winter and possibly help them in re-establishing their homes and giving them sufficient shelter during the coming winter. Supplies can be bought advantageously at San Antonio, and the railroads have generously offered free transportation for all supplies for the afflicted district.

It is difficult to believe that a country that has been so proverbially generous in responding to appeals of this character, even from far distant countries, such as China and Japan, should be backward in extending the necessary relief when the trouble is among our nearest neighbors just across the border in Mexico, and where the blow has fallen heaviest on a poor, destitute class of people, who are without the means of helping themselves.

It is only just to say that in this emergency Mexico has been more than generous in coming to the relief of her own people, but the disaster is so appalling and widespread in its extent, involving as it does a large proportion of two States in the Republic and probably 100,000 people, and the means of carrying relief to the afflicted are so difficult and complicated that the task is entirely beyond the ability of the country to cope with successfully. Especially is this true when it is remembered that, because of the peculiar situation, every day's delay means a loss of many lives by starvation and exposure.

I believe that all that is necessary is for the true situation to be brought to the charitable people of the United States and that the response will be as full and generous as it has been in other instances of a similar character, and I feel satisfied that as soon as the American people fully understand the situation they will be glad to put their shoulders to the wheel, as they have in other instances, and organize a relief movement that shall be commensurate in its results with the terrible disaster.

Advices from State Department

The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, desiring to know what was being done to relieve the sufferers in the stricken districts, communicated with the State Department at Washington, and received the following telegram, containing reports from the United States Minister and several consuls in the affected territory, from Hon. Alvey A. Adee, Acting Secretary of State:

WASHINGTON, D. C. September 17, 1909.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH:

Consul-General Hanna, at Monterey, telegraphs as follows, on August 30:

"Officers of the Association of the American Colony requested me to appeal, through the State Department and press, giving the American people an opportunity to assist the destitute flood sufferers at Monterey. Estimated several hundred drowned and thousands homeless. Good use will be made of all funds sent care of the Consulate. It might be gratefully remembered and appreciated that this city of one hundred thousand inhabitants does eighty-five per cent. of its foreign trade with the United States. It is evident that nearly every person in Monterey has suffered loss, and very many of poorer class have lost everything."

On August 30: "Please tell the American press that flood disaster is more terrible than at first supposed. Twelve hundred are dead, it is estimated, and fifteen thousand are homeless. Rain continues. Terrible suffering must follow. We are doing all we can. Americans contributing should telegraph me their remittances through the banks, as there will be no trains and no mails for several days."

On September 7: "Reports and appeals from country towns adjacent to Monterey declare that there is great destitution and keen suffering, extending nearly to the Rio Grande in one direction and to the Gulf in another. Nearly a thousand have been clothed from supplies at Consulate, but demand constantly continues. Several carloads of goods have reached me from the United States. The Wells-Fargo Express Company carry all goods of proper size, consigned to me, free, and the Mexican government waive all duty on such consignments. The local Red Cross has organized, and I have offered to co-operate with them."

On September 11: "Dr. and Mrs. Lopez, head members of the Mexican National Red Cross, have been here several days, and expect to remain. They have organized a local society of the Red Cross. Mrs. Lopez is the daughter of the Mexican Minister of War and is president of the Mothers' National Congress. They are evidently the most worthy and earnest people. I have met with them and am co-operating with them in their work. Their plan is to provide not only temporary shelter and relief for the thousands of very poor and unfortunate flood sufferers, but to build small, comfortable, respectable homes for them in the new part of the city, near work and the factories. This meets my most hearty approval and sympathy, as it meets the sympathy of the general Business Men's Committee. Homes and shelter must be provide for these people in new localities in the city, away from the river, and they must be housed before cold nights and cold fall rains set in, or else the death rate will be awful and the suffering terrible. Thousands of old men, women, children and working people are without homes and proper shelter, and the wisest plan appears to be to provide comfortable houses for them before winter; such as will save life, prevent suffering and have an elevating influence on the rising generation, their children, who now have no proper shelter whatever. I am informed great efforts are being made to provide money for such proper permanent homes and shelter before the winter sets in. As their numbers are great, a large sum of money will be required to build these houses and furnish them with necessary, plain furniture. They have lost their all, and will suffer and die without such help and shelter. The Mexican people are doing nobly to meet the situation, but nearly every rich Mexican business man and property owner has suffered losses. The people of England, Germany,

Farmers of Northern Mexico

Canada, some countries of Europe, and quite a number from the United States have sent help in large and small amounts. A more general effort on the part of our generous people seems greatly needed. Now is our chance to help Mexico and show our true friendship in this, her time of great affliction, for she is closer to us in every respect than to any other country. I respectfully suggest that any of our bankers, merchants and manufacturers can conveniently send their contributions through the Monterey houses to whom they sell goods, or with whom they have business relations, or I will receive any such funds when desired. Please bring to the attention of the Red Cross and give this to the press. Nearly all the country from Monterey northeast to Matamoras, and from Monterey to Victoria, is terribly afflicted.

"It is believed by many that more than ten thousand lives have been lost. Thousands are homeless, and winter coming on."

Both Crops and Gardens Destroyed

On September 11: "American Consul at Matamoras reports Matamoras under water and serious condition of affairs prevailing. I wired him five hundred yesterday for immediate relief. The railroads between Matamoras and Monterey are washed away. I respectfully suggest that it might be possible for the American Army in the Southwest to investigate and co-operate with Mexican Army and American and Mexican Consuls in lending assistance to border towns on Rio Grande River. There has been great loss of life and property in the country and the small towns between Monterey and Matamoras. It is reported that both crops and gardens are destroyed. We are sending supplies down the railroad as fast as it is opened."

Ambassador Thompson, at Mexico City, telegraphed the Department on August 30: "Floods in and near Monterey, State of Nuevo Leon, have destroyed many millions of property, drowned probably not less than fourteen hundred people, and left many thousand homeless and hungry. The ruin and destitution justifies help from our government, if any possible way to give it, especially in view of Mexico's action at the time of the San Francisco earthquake. Personally, I have already given the Minister of the Interior one thousand dollars, to be forwarded as seems best to him."

MONT-LAWN'S BEST SEASON ENDED

THE last stage-load of merry, shouting children has wound its way past the "Lodge," down the road between the stone walls and massive flower-crowned pillars which mark the entrance to Mont-Lawn. The season of 1909 is ended, and while the trees are as green, the grass as velvety, the flowers as bright, the life seems gone out from the "Children's Paradise."

The swings hang straight and take on a disconsolate air, the "giant strides," "see-saws," "toboggan slides" and lazy "dragon-boat" all mutely say, "The children are gone."

A peep into dainty Rosemary Nursery brings a rush of remembrance of the dear little ones who have taken turns in sleeping in the snowy-white cribs. It is early morning, and one can still mark the place where wee heads, curly and brown, or crowned with ebon locks, have left their impression on the pillows. A tiny pair of half-worn shoes, left standing by "teacher's" low rocker, tell of busy little feet, shod anew for the home-going. "Rompers," blouses and wee "panties" are here and there, scattered about in various stages of dilapidation, for Susie and Tommie and blue-eyed Johnny must never wear those play-worn garments home. Mended and laundered, they will be put away in perfect order among the other clothing in the storeroom, awaiting other little ones who will wear them next year.

What is that peeping out from under one of the cribs? Nothing but a little white woolly dog, with shoe-button eyes. Johnny K. held it tight in his baby arms as he slept last night, only loosening his hold when called to be dressed for a ride in the "booful" carriage. And here is a dollie much the worse for wear, hair askew, minus one eye, and sadly deficient in other parts of doll anatomy; but what a comfort this poor little effigy has brought to more than one baby who, tired of the long day's play, has been soothed to sleep in this cool, quiet room, with its trailing rose-bud walls and pure white furnishings.

From the wide Homestead veranda one looks in vain down "Sunshine Avenue," past "Sunbeam," "Tibballs," "Hope" and "Temple" cottages for a sign of the long procession of boys and girls, marching to song service in the beautiful Children's Temple; and one waits in vain for a sound of the swelling chorus, sung as only the children at the Home can sing, as it floats from the Temple doors. All is silent. Out in "Fort Plenty," tables are deserted, to be set no more this season. The clatter of dishes, the chatter of merry, happy voices no longer tell of three hundred busy little ones, each with a most astonishing capacity for clearing dishes and draining mugs. The last grace has been sung, the last meal has been eaten, and homeward bound the children have shouted their merry good-bys to Superintendent and teachers, who look about, saying to each other, "The children are gone, and, beautiful as the place is, it is not the same without them; but what a pleasant summer we have had, and it has seemed to go so quickly!"

The many improvements instituted this year by Dr. Klopsch have not only resulted in greater comfort for the children, but have added much to the beauty of the place. Visitors from far and near, especially those who are familiar with various other institutions for helping the poor children of the city, never fail to express their delight at the beauty of this place. And especially are they impressed with the spontaneous and hearty happiness of the children. When the gong is sounded from the Homestead veranda, from far and near, from the ball field across the road, from the hillside gym, from groups gathered beneath the shade of the spreading trees, the children come, forming in line before the Homestead and down the long gravel driveway. None hesitate or stand on the order of their coming, but all come at once, for that gong never means but one thing—assemble!

Mont-Lawn, After the Children Have Gone

In a marvelously short time children who come from the city pale, weak and discouraged looking, begin to put on the Mont-Lawn smile, to shout Mont-Lawn cheers, to grow rosy-cheeked and happy looking, responding to Dr. Klopsch's greeting in such a manner as almost to take that good man's breath away; but so amenable to teaching and kindly discipline are they that at the uplifting of his hand, or at the first sound of his voice, there is perfect silence, pleasant anticipation being mirrored on every childish face; for Dr. Klopsch never was known to speak any but pleasant, loving words to the children.

Whether on the green lawns playing the famous "bean game," or presiding over the meetings in the Temple, he is ever the same, the children's loving friend. Every Saturday and Sunday while the Home is open he comes regularly, and if anything is needed to stimulate an always enthusiastic crowd of children the cry of "Dr. Klopsch is coming!" is all that is needed.

During the past season there have been numerous innovations, pleasant little changes—not always little, though—which have added greatly to the enjoyment of the children and to the beauty of the place. The brain and heart of the founder of the Home are always on the alert for something to make the little ones happy and to proudly show visiting friends what love and kindly care will do for children who have had, in many cases, too little of either. The response which he received from the children must make his heart glad indeed and fully compensate for the time and thought given by him to this beautiful work. The strength of love and loyalty to the cause of neglected childhood is shown on every hand at Mont-Lawn. The founder's strong and purposeful individuality has left its imprint from north to south and east to west, from the entrance to the farthest boundary line of the Children's Paradise. Under the inspiring direction of such a chief it is no wonder that the workers have succeeded in bringing about so admirable a system, that strangers wonder at the readiness and willingness of the children in responding to any and every call; at their happy faces and joyful voices.

Two important factors are in a measure responsible for this: the children are kept busy—time does not hang heavy—and they are allowed to shout and make all the noise they please at their play and games. One pretty feature introduced this season was the figure marching on the lawn, the boys' column led by Sergeant Schirmer, the girls' by one of the young lady teachers. Twining in and out among the trees, over the bright green of the lawn, the boys and girls were a beautiful sight, reminding one of a broad, vari-colored ribbon as the pink, white, blue, green and yellow of dresses and hair-ribbons blended in the sunlight while little feet kept perfect time to the strains of an inspiring march.

All these things are but a memory now, both to children and workers. The summer is ended, but the harvest is not past, for the fruits of this summer's seeding and planting will reach out, to be plucked by the little ones after many summers, and the inspiration of the work and its accomplishment will linger as a pleasant memory with all who helped in making the season of 1909 the most successful since the founding of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home.

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS.

CELEBRATION WEEK IN NEW YORK

AS this issue is going to press New York City and State are together carrying out the elaborate programme for the magnificent Hudson-Fulton Celebration, the preparations for which have extended over a year's time. Fleets from foreign countries, special representatives of high rank from rulers in Europe and Asia and from the South American republics have come to add their presence to the gorgeous pageantry of parades by sea and land, the illuminations and commemorative exercises. States North, South, East and West sent troops to make it a truly national affair; for the discovery of the Hudson and the beginning of steam navigation cannot be considered as a local event, to be commemorated alone by any one State or group of States. The number of visitors can only be estimated by the hundred thousand. The work of the great central committee was divided among many subordinate committees, with good results, for each worked in its own field to carry out its special task, knowing that the others were working equally hard to make a magnificent whole. The members of the committees who arranged the details for the greatest historical celebration ever held in Europe or America may be perfectly satisfied with the results accomplished. Several events of interest occurred just before the opening day, which whetted popular interest and kept people in a state of expectation for the more important events to follow.

First, the Dutch warships steamed up through the Narrows, over the same line taken by the Half Moon three centuries ago. The men lined the decks and gazed eagerly for the first sight of the city of which they had heard so much. When they saw the towering buildings piercing the sky-line they almost lost their breath in astonishment. For several days thereafter they could be seen walking in squads along Broadway, stopping every few moments while they bent their necks almost to the point of dislocation to catch a glimpse of some structure which they thought might be higher than the rest.

Lieutenant Lam, of the Royal Dutch Navy, who takes the part of Henry Hudson, or Hendrik as the Hollanders call him, was taken on an exploring tour of New York before taking command of the Half Moon and getting into seventeenth century costume to sail his bluff-bowed ship in the naval parade up the Hudson.

Holland is taking great interest in the celebration, and her representatives have been greatly pleased to see the Dutch flag conspicuous in all the decorations and her arms picked out in many-colored electric lights. Every street boy has a reproduction of the colors under which the Half Moon sailed, and from every house can be seen the yellow, white and blue bunting mingling with the red, white and blue of Old Glory.

Great Britain sent over a fleet composed of several of her finest battleships and cruisers, under the command of Admiral Seymour, to take part in the celebration, for though Hudson sailed a Dutch ship for a Dutch company he himself was of the same seafaring race which produced, a few years before, Drake, Hawkins, Raleigh and Frobisher. The fleets or single ships of several other nations dropped into and sailed up the Narrows during the week preceding the official opening until the vari-colored flags, snapping above the armored hulls, made one of the finest naval pictures the eye could rest upon. Our fleet numbers about fifty, including ships of all classes from the stately battleship down to the saucy submarine ready to play a game of hide and seek with friend or foe.

Of course the great centres of attraction were the Half Moon and the Clermont, both of which have been described in previous issues of this paper. The trying out of the new Clermont before the committee was an interesting event, and the ship behaved much like the original except, this being the twentieth century instead of the opening days of the nineteenth, she showed a too evident desire to go too fast, a failing which would have delighted the inventor, Fulton, if he could have come back to earth to see.

The Clermont was tried out on the placid waters of the Kill von Kull, and went nine miles in two hours. She had quite a number of people on her decks when she started out from the shipbuilding works, and a larger crowd on the shore cheered itself hoarse as the momentous journey began.

Like the original Clermont, the paddlewheels went round for a few times and then stopped, and a look of disappointment spread over the faces of the passengers.

Suddenly several members of the crew vaulted over the rails, stood for a moment on the paddles, and then began to jump up and down. There was a rasping sound and splash, and the boat was moving once more. All of the tugs and steamers began to toot when the strange craft hove in sight, and the old salts at Sailors' Snug Harbor lined up on the seawall and gazed in astonishment as the steamer went splashing by. There were no boxes over the paddles, and the naked paddles threatened a shower-bath for any one who ventured near.

The boat has quite a "roomy" appearance. It is 150 feet long and 18 feet wide. The engine is much like those used to-day on river seamers, except that the walking beam is below the engine instead of on top, and the transmission gear is composed of cog-wheels. Most of the boiler can be seen from over the side.

The committee was pleased with the results of the trip, and the steamer was accepted for the celebration. A full account of the important events of the two weeks' celebration will appear in an approaching issue.

TRUSTING AND DOING*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN the beginning of this lesson it is well to give a brief summary of events:

1. The apostle Paul was taken to the Castle Antonia a prisoner by the Roman soldiers for the protection of his life rather than for the restraint of his liberty. 2. Paul declared himself a Roman citizen, and so prevented an examination by scourging. 3. Paul was brought by the Roman captain before the council of the Jews, that he might discover what charge was brought against him. 4. The council ended in a quarrel between the Pharisees and Sadducees. 5. Paul was returned to prison. 6. The night following, Paul's second night in prison, the Lord himself stood by him with words of cheer and reassurance that his life was safe and that he should bear witness at Rome. 7. The "forty" who had made a pact that they would neither eat nor drink anything until they had killed Paul, bound themselves with an oath in the presence of the chief priests and elders to that effect, and sought their co-operation. 8. Paul's sister's son, hearing of the pact, visited his uncle in the prison, that he might tell him about it. 9. Paul sent his nephew to the chief captain, with the information he had brought. 10. The chief captain determined to remove Paul to a distant prison at once, and so defeat the plot. 11. According to the chief captain's orders a troop was immediately formed, consisting of four hundred and seventy men, two hundred of whom were foot soldiers (infantry), seventy cavalry and two hundred spearmen, and a relay of horses, "beasts" for Paul, the prisoner, to ride upon. 12. At nine o'clock in the night they started. 13. A forced march of ten hours brought them to Antipatris, about forty-two miles on their way. 14. The horsemen, having passed the most dangerous part of the journey, returned to Jerusalem, leaving Paul in charge of the four hundred soldiers. 15. The second day Paul was brought to Cæsarea and delivered to the governor, who received him kindly, because of a letter which the chief captain had sent, declaring that he laid nothing to Paul's charge worthy of death or of bonds.

"Trust in God and Do the Right"

In this watchword is the central truth of this lesson story. When Paul had the assurance from God that all would be right with him, he did not lie back and cease to do anything to better his condition; on the contrary, he put forth every possible effort. "He framed and conducted a counter plot to defeat the conspiracy of the Jewish priesthood, with as much zeal and care as if he had not obtained from God previous assurance of his safety."—Arnot. Furthermore, "No view of the divine purposes can be right that in any measure tends to slacken human zeal and energy." We show best our trust in God by seeking to co-operate with him. Can God do anything with a coward or a listless person? is a question to be considered.

Down the steep slope of a great mountain side a party of travelers were following their guide. Suddenly, unexpectedly, they came to a standstill before a yawning crevasse in a glacier, which must be crossed if they would reach home. "Follow me," cried the guide, as he leaped easily across to the other side. One of the party obeyed, and in a moment he stood beside the guide. Another followed and another, until all but one man were safely over. But the last man stood with white, set face and horror-stricken eyes, gazing at the dreadful crevasse. "I can't," he cried in despair. Swiftly the guide stepped forward and, holding out his strong right hand, said, "That hand has never failed the hand that grasped it." In a moment the traveler laid his hand in the one stretched out to him, jumped, and was safe on the other side. Yes, God can do something with a coward who is willing to put trust in him.

The late Henry M. Stanley, in his picture of Starvation Camp, says: "Out of the pale black darkness came the eerie shapes that haunt the fever land; that jibe and mock the lonely man and weave figures of flame, and draw fiery forms in the mantle of night; and whispers breathed through the heavy air of graves and worms and forgetfulness; and a demon hinted in the dazed brain that 'twere better to rest than to think with a sickening heart; and the sough of the wind through the crowns of the thick black bush seemed to sigh and moan, 'Lost! lost! lost! thy labor and thy grief are vain.' Comfortless days upon days; brave lives are sobbing their last; man after man rolled down to the death, to mildew and rot, and thou wilt be left alone!" And there came to him the thought of God, and he quoted to himself the words from the sacred Book: "Ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" And as such thoughts possessed his mind the straining of the eyes through the darkness was relaxed, and the sight was invited to see dumb witnesses of past mercies on this or that forgotten occasion. One memory begat another, until the stubborn heart was melted and his great needs were laid, as upon a tablet, before the Great Deliverer. After this spiritual food he slept, and awoke in the morning to new courage. He roused his fainting followers, and they had marched less than an hour when they came in sight of the outskirts of a plantation, and their eyes were gladdened with abundance of fruit. The great traveler says: "In a second of time the weak, the lame, the crippled, the limping and moaning people forgot their griefs and their woes and shouted the grateful chant which goes up of its own accord toward the skies out of the full and sensitive hearts, 'Thanks be to God!'"

Can we think that for a moment Paul, when dragged out of the temple court, or when he was in danger of being scourged, or when he was confined in the prison, ever had a coward's tinge in his heart? If he had, it does not appear; but he was human. We should not discredit him if we really knew it to be so, because he came out so valiantly in the fight. We might even honor him all the more because he clothed himself with courage and trust to meet the occasion.

Napoleon said: "Marshal Ney should have no credit for courage; he does not know what fear is. But Marshal Brune ought to have credit for being brave, for he never goes into battle without trembling, and yet he will not run." The Christian hero is one who stands firm when the test comes, knowing that there is nothing strong in him but God. Paul sought the opportunity to quell the angry feelings of his would-be murderers by asking for a chance to speak to them from the steps leading to the prison; he defended himself in prison by declaring his Roman citizenship; he sought greater safety by informing the chief captain of impending dangers. But all of these things he did while he was trusting in God. Some one in writing to young men said: "Trust yourself; take out of yourself all you can get." So far, so good, if it is continued with a "Trust in God."

Troubles Unaware

Paul in the temple, fulfilling his vow, and helping others to do the same, could have had no thought of impending attacks upon his life. He was in the line of duty, and wholly given over to it. In this he is an example to us. Said an old man: "I've had an awful lot of trouble in this world, and half of it never happened!" And it is often the case that imaginary troubles are worse than real ones. It is impossible to get to-day's blessing if you bear tomorrow's burden. Paul had the blessing of fulfilling his vows before assault and imprisonment came upon him.

Even a child may know what it is to trust in God. A number of years ago Captain D—— commanded a vessel sailing from Liverpool to New York, and on one voyage he had all of his family on board the ship.

One night, when all were quietly asleep, there arose a sudden squall of wind, which came sweeping over the waters until it struck the vessel and instantly threw her on one side, tumbling and crashing everything that was movable and awakening the passengers to a consciousness that they were in imminent peril. Every one on board was alarmed and uneasy, and some sprang from their berths and began to dress that they might be ready for the worst. Captain D—— had a little girl on board just eight years old, who, of course, awoke with the rest. "What's the matter?" asked the frightened child. They told her that a squall had struck the ship. "Is father on deck?" she asked. "Yes, he is," she was told. She dropped herself on her pillow again without a fear, and in a few minutes was sleeping peacefully in spite of winds and waves.

And here is a story for the boys about a hero in hiding. It was told by John B. Gough.

He went one day with a friend away up to a small garret room.

A feeble voice said, "Come in," and they went in.

There was no light, but as soon as their eyes were dilated to the gloom they saw, lying on a heap of chips and shavings, a boy about ten years of age, pale, but with a singularly sweet face.

They asked the boy, "What are you doing there?"

"Hush, hush! I am hiding."

"Hiding? What for?"

The child showed his white, delicate arms covered with bruises, and swollen.

"Who was it beat you like that?"

"Hush! don't tell him; my father did it."

"What for?"

"Poor father got drunk, and beat me because I wouldn't steal."

"Did you ever steal?"

"Yes, sir, I was a thief once."

"Then why don't you steal now?"

"Because I went to the ragged school, and they taught me, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and told me about God in heaven. I will not steal, sir, if my father kills me."

Mr. Gough's friend said, "I don't know what to do with you. Here is a shilling. I will see what I can do for you."

The boy looked at it a moment, and then said:

"But, please, sir, wouldn't you like to hear my little hymn?"

They though it strange that, lying there without food, without fire, bruised and beaten, he could sing a hymn. How could he sing the Lord's song in a strange land? But they said, "Yes, we will hear you."

And then, in a sweet low voice, the child sang:

> Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
> Look upon a little child;
> Pity my infirmity,
> Suffer me to come to thee.
> Fain would I to thee be brought,
> Gentle Lord, forbid it not;
> In the kingdom of thy grace
> Give a little child a place.

"That's my little hymn; good-by!"

The gentleman went again in the morning, mounted the stairs, knocked at the door—no answer; opened it, and went in.

The shilling lay on the floor, and there, too, lay the boy, with a brave smile on his face, as if to make the best of it; and so he had—for he was dead.

What Came Out of Paul's Trust in God

Rather a new meaning is attached to the word "atmosphere" when we hear t used in describing personality. Some persons carry such a genial atmosphere with them that they make friends wherever they go; others have such a bitter atmosphere that they are sure to irritate those with whom they come in contact. Paul's atmosphere was that of a cultivated Christian gentleman. He was, therefore, an enigma to the Roman captain, who acknowledged his superiority, but could not understand it; and so he appealed to Paul himself and to the council for an explanation, but still he was not brought to an understanding of Paul. And yet he felt compelled to provide for his prisoner in a most unusual manner. The escort which he gave to Paul was almost suited to a royal personage. It was none too good for Paul; he was worthy of it. It was God in Paul that the chief captain felt, but did not recognize. And under the spell he was constrained to write the remarkable letter concerning Paul to the governor of Cæsarea (read the letter, Acts 23:26-33). In beautiful character marks Paul had "branded on him the marks of Jesus."

IN QUIET SEPTEMBER DAYS

After College, What?

A MULTITUDE of young men and women have been graduated this summer from institutions of learning and technical schools. They have devoted the years of their lives up to this point to the securing of a liberal education. We are constantly told that those who have achieved the greatest distinction in college are not likely to be the prize-winners when the race is on the actual stage of existence. This statement challenges investigation. While it is undoubtedly true that a youth or maiden may study so laboriously and submit the brain to so reckless a forcing process that the period of development may cease when the college diploma has been gained, still those who are thus unfortunate are in the minority. Very many of those who have forged in advance of their fellows in profession and business careers early gave promise of what they should hereafter do. The pale, sallow and attentuated student is seldom in evidence in these days of healthful interest in athletic sports. The young people who have left colleges and universities this summer do credit in physique to their wholesome training in fresh air and exercise. A sound body and a sound mind are not exceptional in our time among the young.

What shall these graduates first undertake? Nine-tenths of the young men at least have had before them the definite aim of attempting self-support as soon as their college days are over. A large contingent have worked during their vacations with the honorable end of wage-earning in view. Those who are to become physicians, lawyers and ministers confront another period of hard work before they can begin life in earnest.

Among the young women those most to be envied are they who may return to their homes to take upon themselves the role of ministering angels. The girl who can simply for a while live under her parents' roof as the dear home daughter, who may in the course of a year, or two or three, leave her childhood's home to be the queen of a little domain of her own, is of all girls the happiest. The finest education, the best mental discipline and the widest equipment are not wasted on the woman whose destiny is to be a wife and, if heaven please, a mother.

A host of girls must without delay find remunerative employment. They are as urgently wanted in the field of business and in the various professions as their brothers are. The woman doctor is no longer met by an interrogation mark. She is needed in the woman's college, in the sanatorium, in the orphanage and in private practice. In our common schools and in all the preparatory schools teachers with college diplomas are sought, and it is almost an accepted fact that no others need apply. The college student who has specialized during her course in advanced mathematics, English literature or physical science will speedily find her niche.

A field almost unknown a generation ago is to-day open to the student of either sex who possesses energy, versatility and consecration. The Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations are looking for secretaries to carry forward their beneficent work. Where shall they find them if not among our college graduates? The foreign mission field also extends its invitation to student volunteers.

THE QUIET HOUSE

IN the House of Too Much Trouble
Lived a lonely little boy;
He was eager for a playmate,
He was hungry for a toy;
But 'twas always too much bother,
Too much dirt, and too much noise,
For the House of Too Much Trouble
Wasn't meant for little boys.

And sometimes the little fellow
Left a book upon the floor,
Or forgot and laughed too loudly,
Or he failed to close the door.
In a House of Too Much Trouble
Things must be precise and trim—
In a House of Too Much Trouble
There was little room for him.

He must never scatter playthings,
He must never romp and play;
Every room must be in order,
And kept quiet all the day.
He had never had companions,
He had never owned a pet;
In the House of Too Much Trouble
It is trim and quiet yet.

Ev'ry room is set in order—
Every book is in its place,
And the lonely little fellow
Wears a smile upon his face.
In the House of Too Much Trouble
He is silent and at rest—
In the House of Too Much Trouble
With a lily on his breast.

Empress Eugenie in Ireland, Starting on a Tour of the Lakes of Killarney

THE Empress Eugenie has been a picturesque figure throughout her life. In her youth she was famous for beauty, and in becoming the wife of Napoleon III. was elevated to a position of great eminence. Every one knows the story of her later years, her long widowhood, the heartbreak of the death in Zululand of her only son, and her dignified retirement at Chiselhurst, England. She was much esteemed by Queen Victoria, with whom she was on terms of intimate friendship. The picture shows the ex-Empress on an excursion to the famous Lakes of Killarney.

Children's Names

A MARRIED daughter, resident nearly a thousand miles from the home of her parents and separated from the early home of her husband by an almost equal distance, found that the names of her children were subjects of concern to grandparents and aunties on both sides of the house. In selecting the names her boys and girls should bear she tried her best to please every one, venturing on her own account into new combinations of family names and into certain poetic liberties with old-fashioned and quaint Christian names. The children's father was satisfied to leave the choice of names almost wholly to their mother. Not so the kindred, who wrote letters of protest from time to time when one and another name, as the babies followed each other into the household, was submitted for their consideration. Finally the mother resolved that the names the children were to bear throughout life, some of them already hallowed by baptism, must be, so far as possible, made agreeable to everybody and must thenceforward be let alone. Being a woman who had a love of fun and a quick appreciation of humor, she sent a revised list of her children's names to the homes east and west with which her home was allied. The names themselves were little changed in essentials, but the combinations were rearranged, and peace descended upon the scene.

The naming of a child is not a matter of small importance, and, since the one most concerned is not consulted in the matter at all, this business of naming should not be treated too lightly. There are Mary Janes who have changed their own names to Dorothy or Jean Marie, and Hirams who have changed theirs to Arthur, but few people are quite so daring. Most of us go through life bearing our baptismal names unaltered.

One Duty of the Housekeeper

The housekeeper, whether she live in the city or the country, should take great pains to prevent the accumulation of decaying vegetable matter in her premises. Cellars and back doors should be constantly supervised and sedulously guarded, and too much pains, it may be added, cannot be taken to keep wells and cisterns entirely pure. When, after a summer of exceptional beauty, there follows an outbreak of dysentery or typhoid fever in the autumn, the blame cannot be laid at the door of Divine Providence. There is frequently no mystery whatever in such an epidemic. It is due directly to heedlessness about household sanitation.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

E. J. B. Young people intending marriage should, if possible, have something saved beforehand against a rainy day. A little capital in the bank will prevent a great deal of anxiety and will enable you both to start your new life with a margin for illness, loss of income through change of business or any other unforeseen cause.

The Story of Marco

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters" and "The Transformation of Margaret"

CHAPTER XXXIX
At the Hospital

IT WAS not quite half past ten when Marco reached the hospital. There was evident relief in the eyes of the nurse as she greeted him.

"I am so glad you came," she said. "I was afraid you would not get my message."

"Message?"

"Yes. I telephoned to the hotel for you to come at once; but they said they thought you had gone out."

"I had gone out. I didn't get the message; but I had already started for here, so it was all right. But is my father—worse?"

"No—and yes. He is weaker, and the end can't be far off; but his mind is perfectly clear, and I felt you should see him. You told me that you had some questions to ask him. Those questions must be asked soon—if at all."

"But is he—strong enough to—talk?" Marco's face paled a little as he spoke.

"I think so, if he is not excited. He is so fond of you! Really, sir, it is you, not we, who have kept him alive all these months."

"I know," murmured the other, a little huskily, as he turned away.

In the sick-room John Covino sat propped up in bed with several pillows at his back. His dark hair had turned almost white at the temples, and his cheeks were sunken pitifully. But his eyes were bright, and told of a clear brain behind them. As his son entered the room he smiled, and held out his hand.

"Marco!" he cried rapturously.

For some minutes they talked on commonplace themes. Marco was hesitating to broach any deeper subject; then the thought of Florence waiting alone gave him courage.

"Father, I've some news for you," he began a little tremulously, though he tried hard to make his voice cheery. "I have told you of Florence, Mrs. Preston's adopted daughter; haven't I?"

The sick man nodded his head happily. He was very sure he knew what was coming. Many times he had seen the love-light in his son's eyes when he spoke of this girl.

"Well, she and I made a great discovery yesterday." Marco was speaking in a low voice, and almost steadily. On the bed the sick man was still smiling happily at this good thing that had come to his boy. "This discovery concerned both of us, and you, too, father."

The man nodded—of course it concerned him, this love story of his boy!

"You know long ago, father, you had a daughter—a little Florence, my sister." Marco was speaking hurriedly now. He had thought to lead up to the matter more gradually, but the strain was becoming unbearable. "Well, this older Florence, that I've known lately, is only Mrs. Preston's adopted daughter, and we discovered yesterday that she and the little Florence of long ago are the same, father. Your little daughter has returned to you a beautiful young woman. She wants to come to see you."

To his surprise there was no joy there. The sick man's face expressed only amazed disappointment.

"But, Marco—that was the girl you loved!" he gasped.

The quick red surged into Marco's face.

"Why, father, how—" he began, in surprise; then the color receded. "That is over now, father, of course," he finished mechanically.

On the bed the sick man leaned forward.

"Do you mean—you do love her—and you've got to give her up—because of that?" he demanded.

Marco gave an impatient gesture.

"Dad, it can't do any good to speak of that," he demurred. "Let us talk of Florence. She wants to come to see you."

The sick man's eyes grew eager, and a red flush came to his cheeks.

"But you don't have to give her up, Marco," he protested, excitedly. "She isn't your sister."

For a moment the young man's heart seemed to stop its beating; then it began again with great throbs that almost took his breath. An unbelieving joy leaped to his eyes only to recede with almost equal swiftness.

"You don't understand," he explained, sadly. "We proved it beyond all doubt yesterday—unfortunately. She remembers me and the gipsy camp. There is no mistake possible."

"Yes, but—" the sick man fell back suddenly. His face had grown very white.

"Father, don't talk of it any more," begged the son. "You will injure yourself. Dad, please don't."

The other shook his head feebly.

"No, no; I'm all right. It's only for a minute. I'll be better soon. I'm trying to think. There's something I want to say."

"But not now, father. Not to-day. Wait until some time when you are stronger."

"No, no; I want to do it now. I've wanted to tell you often before; but I—dreaded it so. It's about yourself—your name—and you must know. Call the nurse."

"But, father—" an imperative gesture silenced him, and he stepped to the door, his eyes troubled and blurred with tears.

"He has been talking too much, I'm afraid," he explained hurriedly to the nurse. "There is still more that he wishes to say, he declares. But—"

From the bed a nervously insistent voice interrupted his words.

"Nurse, those drops that you give me sometimes—I want them now. I must speak. Quick, I tell you I must!"

Five minutes later he lay quietly back among the pillows. His eyes were closed, but a faint color was stealing into his lips.

"He'll be easier now," nodded the nurse, as she turned at the door. "And you'd better let him say what he wants to. It can't do more harm than it would to keep it to himself—as he's feeling now."

CHAPTER XL
The Father's Story

FOR some minutes after the nurse had left the room, Marco watched in silence. Then his father opened his eyes.

"Marco," he began quietly, "I don't

"MIDNIGHT CALLERS"

By ISABELLA McDONALD ALDEN ("Pansy")

Vivid, realistic, a recital of human experience. Next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD

The soap you find in most sleeping cars and hotels is, usually, not the kind of soap you use at home.

As a rule, it is highly perfumed—and artificially colored. Possibly, you like that kind of soap. Probably, you do not. But, in a hotel, you have no choice.

So, here's a suggestion—slip a half cake of Ivory Soap in your toilet-case before you leave home.

With it, you can keep your hands, face and body scrupulously clean. If necessary, you can use it for shaving. Thousands of men do; and like it.

Ivory Soap . . It Floats.

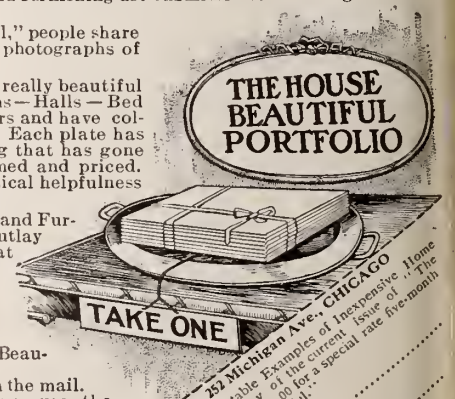
Notable Examples of INEXPENSIVE DECORATION & FURNISHING in Perfect Taste

I think perhaps more examples of decoration and furnishing are submitted to me in a given time than to any other one person.

Because I edit and publish "The House Beautiful," people share with me the joy of their achievements and send me photographs of their triumphs.

I have selected a number of notable examples of really beautiful and correct effects—Living Rooms—Dining Rooms—Halls—Bed Rooms. These I have reproduced in natural colors and have collected them into "The House Beautiful Portfolio." Each plate has complete description of the rooms with everything that has gone into the furnishing and decorating, accurately named and priced. You will enjoy their beauty, but it is in their practical helpfulness that you will appreciate their true value.

Artists who make a business of Home Decoration and Furnishing submit such plates only when a lavish outlay is contemplated. These notable examples show what can be done with limited means through the exercise of careful selection, guided by a fully developed understanding of what is appropriate.



May I Help?

If you want the Portfolio you want "The House Beautiful," my monthly magazine.

Just sign the coupon, enclose $1.00 and drop it in the mail.

I will send you at once, quite by way of good measure, the "Portfolio of Color Plates" and a copy of the current issue of "The House Beautiful."

For your dollar I will send you the five succeeding numbers of "The House Beautiful," so you see you will get in all a full 6 months of the magazine. The regular subscription price is $2.50 per year.

Fill out the coupon, pin a dollar bill to it and mail to—

THE STORY OF MARCO

want you to think I don't realize what you have done for me all these years. I don't want you to think I'm ungrateful. There have been times when I've blamed myself bitterly, when I've known that I've done wrong from the very beginning. But I think now—now I can pay you back in a measure. I can do something for you.

"To begin with, you haven't any call to be ashamed of yourself, or your blood. It's good. I'll have to go back—'way back, so you'll understand; but 'twon't take long.

"I was nothing but a boy when my mother died. I don't remember much about my home except that it had wide green meadows where my brother and I played all day, and a big stone house where we slept all night. After that, something happened. We lost our money, I suppose. Anyhow, we drifted about from place to place, and then one day father took both us boys and came to America. Even now I can remember the misery of those first few years. My father had been gently born. He was not used to hardship nor poverty, and here he found both. Then one day when we boys were twenty or thereabouts, a man came along and hired all three of us to go down by the Mississippi River to grow cotton. It sounded good to us. We'd have the sky and the earth and the soft air of the southland; and we liked those better than we did the dirty, noisy streets where we were.

"We went—but we hadn't been there a week before we saw our mistake. We had the sky—but we had the hot sun, too; and we had the earth—but that was full of swamps and still lakes with a green slime on top. The air was there, too, but it swarmed with mosquitoes; and then there was the work. That was bad enough, but it wa'n't anything to the treatment we got. The boss was used to drivin' niggers—and he drove us like niggers, and with niggers, too, just because our hair and eyes and skin were dark.

"Until then father had kept up—something of what he had been. He'd sent us to school when he could, and had taught us himself when he couldn't. But he gave up now. He caught the fever, and, in three weeks after we got there, he was dead.

"Naturally we boys didn't stay long then. Already lots of them that had gone down there with us had got away, and we wa'n't long in following. Then came the gipsies. We ran across them one night after we'd been tramping the woods all day, tired and hungry. They took us in, and we just stayed, and sort of drifted along with them. It was easy, and we liked it. We could already sing, and pretty soon we'd picked up the banjo and the guitar. After that we didn't have any trouble but what we could earn a penny or two, when we liked. Then came your mother."

The man paused and closed his eyes.

"I wish you could have seen her as I did," he said dreamily. "She was so pretty, and so young—less than eighteen. She was the daughter of a famous violinist. You'll find his name and all about him in some papers I've got; but never mind that now. They had a country house near where we had set up camp one summer. There were a lot of gay young folks there, and they got to running down to our tents pretty often to have their fortunes told, and for a lark generally. We went there, too, and sang and played at their garden parties—'specially me and my brother.

"From the very first your mother and I took to each other, and I was there a lot with my guitar. It wa'n't long, of course, before we had fallen in love and owned it up to each other. It was my fault, of course. I knew perfectly well I was not fit for her; but I was young, and I didn't care—or rather, I cared too much. Still, it's a question whether anything would have come of it, if the old violinist hadn't set his heart on her marrying another man, and an old one at that. She bolted then, and flew to me, before she had even had time to think of the consequences. We broke camp then, and she went with us—my wife."

Again the man paused, and moistened his lips. His face had grown gray with pain. For some time he had been speaking brokenly, and with evident constraint; but at a word from his son that he should rest, he shook his head decidedly.

"No; I'm going to tell it—though 'tisn't easy—the part that comes now. I've thought sometimes I wouldn't tell; but you've been square by me, and I'm going to be square by you. You've made me see things, too—your religion counts for something. Your mother's did, too. And that's what makes it so hard—now. . . . Looking back at it, I don't see how I did it, anyway. After all, it was always—drink, that was at the bottom of it. I realized, too, that the way I was living was no way for—her. And I was ashamed. We—quarreled sometimes, though 'twas never her fault. She was always good to me.

"When you were three years old, my brother died. I left your mother then with the gipsies, and tried to get good steady work. I promised to go back and get her when I'd found it. But I wa'n't used to work, and I didn't take to it very well. Luck seemed to be against me, too, and I went from bad to worse. Every little while I'd make a new start, but drink—or something—would pull me down again.

"I kept track of the gipsies, and once in a while I'd go to see—your mother; but I don't think by that time my visits did her or any one else much good. I tried to have her go back to her people. But she was proud, and wouldn't. Her father had cast her off, anyhow, and had sent word he never wanted to see her again. So, naturally, she didn't want him to know—how bad things had turned out. Besides, she still declared that she believed some time I'd—make good.

"I went away then, and tried harder than ever; but 'twas no use. After that I only came back to the gipsies on the sly. I saw you often, though you didn't know me: but I kept out of the way of your mother. I didn't know she was dead until long afterwards, and I found you gone, too. That was the night I got crazy drunk, and thought I had killed—a man. Then I skipped that part of the country, and changed my name. The man didn't die, and I came back; but I kept the name. After that I saw you—you know the rest. I'd kept the name then so long, I had to change yours."

"Then I am really — 'Marco Bonelli'?"

"Yes; and—" the man's face changed suddenly. His voice grew almost strong with triumphant joy. "Now I'm going to the good part, Marco! I can give you back the girl you love. You were two years old when one day a train went through a trestle near our camp. It was a fearful sight, but your mother never flinched. She went right into the thick of it, and worked without a thought of herself. In one dead woman's arms she found a little girl baby, about eight or ten months old. No one claimed it, and she took it home to the tent, and took care of it. She thought surely some one would come for it some time; but no one did, and at last she got to look upon it as her own. But it wa'n't. It was——"

"Florence!" cried Marco, starting forward eagerly.

"Yes, Florence—your Flossie."

"But—I don't understand. Mrs. Preston knew her mother. She says Florence was the daughter of her dearest friend. And how—can—that be?"

"I can explain that, too," murmured the sick man; and with a pang Marco noticed how wearily he spoke. "I saw old Uncle Jake of the gipsy camp long afterwards, and he told me Flossie was gone. He said a man came for her. The man had said that his wife had been a very dear friend of Flossie's mother, and that she had supposed the whole family was killed in the accident. Long afterwards she had run across a woman who had been in the wreck, and who told her all about the baby that a gipsy woman had taken from the dead woman's arms. From the description she recognized her friend, and ever since then she had been tracing that baby, until at last she had found her—Flossie. So you see—it's all—straight—to the last," finished the man, faintly.

Marco dropped on his knees by the bedside.

"I do see, father, it's all straight to the last," he echoed brokenly. "And now you must rest—rest! Oh, dad, if I could only make you see—and know—how much you've done for me—now!"

"It's all straight, then, maybe—at the last," he whispered. "And now you go to Flossie."

In the office down-stairs Marco wrote a hasty note.

"DEAREST: It sounds impossible, but it's true! You are no more my sister than—than Madge Dana is. I've seen father, and now I know! You're the little girl back there in the gipsy camp long ago, all right, sweetheart, but that little girl was no sister of mine—ever; neither then, nor now, nor in the future! This note is only the bugle call to happiness, dear—a sort of preparation; for in the shortest possible time I shall be there myself. And I want my welcome to be—just what I know you will make it.

"MARCO."

THE END

Our Oldest Naval Veteran

WILLIAM MACABEE, the 105-year-old veteran of the Navy, has met with an accident. He is now lying in a precarious condition at the hospital of the United States Naval Home in Philadelphia. "Old Bill" was taking his morning walk when he fell and fractured his right thigh. Physicians say that the bones of a man 105 years old are practically lime, and cannot knit. Bill says he feels absolutely no pain, but a fracture at his great age must be regarded as a very serious injury.

Should "Bill" live until the 22d of October he will then have reached the age of 106. He was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1803, enlisted as a cabin boy on the old frigate Constitution, and became an able seaman on that famous craft. He was in active service during the Civil War until its close, and remained in the service of the government until his age compelled him to retire. On his one hundredth birthday he was visited by Secretary Moody and his staff of naval officers.

WHEN A MAN'S DOWN

WHAT'S the use of searching? No job is "on the card."
When a fellow's down and out, it certainly is hard.
No friends to lend a helping hand, a park bench for a bed,
And a cold-water breakfast—well, you wish that you were dead.
Your clothes are getting shabby; you are gazed at with a frown;
I tell you life seems chilly to a fellow when he's down.

Perhaps you ask for charity, and get it (with a sneer
Which makes you cringe and shiver, and gives mighty little cheer).
A single word of kindness would help you bear your lot,
But you are called "a vagrant," whether you are or not.
Are we put here just to suffer? Does God watch us with a frown?
Or is He really sorry for a fellow when he's down?

A long lane has its turning point, I've often heard it said;
To-morrow you may be adrift and suffering for bread,
While mayhe then my ship may come a-sailing up the bay,
And you will realize that luck may alter any day.
So, if you can't do any more, just smile instead of frown,
And try to smooth the pathway of the fellow that is down.

Paul's Peril and Escape

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

PAUL was now a prisoner. The chief captain, a man of impartial justice, was determined that the case of his prisoner should have the full benefit of the law. "He loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down and set him before them."

The opening sentence of Paul's speech shows how completely he stood in the presence of God. The sacred record relates how he was smitten by order of the high priest, and how he rebuked that wicked one. Then arose a great discussion between the Pharisees and Sadducees, and the chief captain, always an enthusiast for justice, fearing lest Paul should be torn in pieces by the rival parties, ordered the soldiers to take him by force from among them and bring him into the castle. It seemed as though evil men, led on by Satan, were having it all their own way, but God was bringing out his purposes for Paul in all that happened. Forty of the Jews had banded themselves together, like Terrorists, to accomplish the murder of Paul. They persuaded themselves, no doubt, that by this deed of violence they would act as true patriots. The conspirators boldly proposed to the chief priests a partnership in their crime, and we have no record of their refusal to connive at it. But they had reckoned without their host. One was present at this infamous interview on whose presence they had not calculated. And He so ordered it that Paul's nephew should hear of their lying in wait; and he went into the castle and told Paul. Thus their deed of blood was frustrated. On hearing from his nephew of the conspiracy against his life, Paul was at no loss what to do. God showed him the best thing to do, and he did it. He called one of the centurions, and besought him to bring his nephew to the chief captain, who had shown himself to be a man of such unswerving justice and impartiality. With the utmost fearlessness and straightforwardness the young man told the facts without any coloring. There was great ingenuousness in the way in which the lad told the chief captain of the plot which was brewing. "The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, as though they would enquire somewhat of him more perfectly. But do not thou yield unto them." Bold words! but their frankness and perfect good faith answered to the truthfulness of his own upright character.

Was it worth while for him to take any steps for the safety of Paul: a man who was of no note politically, nor yet as a military man? All this was true, but God was working behind the scenes, and he made Paul to be of such worth in the eyes of this heathen man that he gave him a bodyguard equal to that of a prince. "He called unto him two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night; and provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix, the governor." The chief captain, no doubt, felt the power of a man in whom God dwelt. He had been present when Paul had told of his conversion, and the clear, true ring of his personal testimony must have been in strong contrast, both to the paganism in which he had been brought up and to the Judaism which prevailed around him. As an impartial witness, it was easy for him to see the jealousy with which the Jews regarded him. We are not told that this man subsequently became converted, but it would be hard to think he did not.

With four hundred and seventy men, who formed Paul's bodyguard, Claudius Lysias sent him to Cæsarea, with a letter to the governor.

MEXICO'S APPEAL FOR HELP

On August 31: "The Mexican government, at my request, has given orders to customs authorities at C. P. Diaz and New Laredo to admit free of charge all relief supplies addressed to American Consul-General, Monterey."

The American Consul at Tampico, in a dispatch dated September 9, reports: "A large portion of the country between Tampico and Monterey, extending as far north as the Soto la Marina River, which empties into the Gulf about 250 kilometres from Tampico, has been inundated. Several bridges of the National Railroad between Tampico and Monterey have been washed away and many miles of track destroyed. Several small villages, situated along the banks of the recent rapidly-rising rivers and creeks, have been literally swept away, and Soto la Marina, a town of about 2,000 inhabitants, near the mouth of the river of the same name, has been completely submerged, nothing but the church spires remaining above the water. The people who survived took refuge on an adjoining hill, and are now in a destitute condition, as they are completely surrounded by water. In answer to a telegram from the alcalde of Aldama, a neighboring town, reporting these distressing conditions, the authorities of Tampico yesterday sent a large steamer to their relief laden with food and clothing. Inasmuch as many Americans have immigrated, within the last three years, into the country affected by these storms and floods, it is quite probable that some of them may have been drowned. I am making every effort, through the present imperfect mail facilities, to obtain information to this end, concerning which I shall advise the Department later."

The Department has to-day telegraphed Consul-General Hanna for information as to area covered by flood, population of that area, how many to-day are suffering or dead, and whether children, mothers and old people are being looked after.

ALVEY A. ADEE,
Acting Secretary of State.

The foregoing telegrams from Secretary Adee were soon followed by two others from the State Department and one direct from Consul-General Hanna, under date of September 18.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 18, 1909.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, CHRISTIAN HERALD, NEW YORK CITY:

Consul-General at Monterey telegraphs as follows, September 17: "Many inquiries received relative to what is appropriate and needed for the terribly destitute people of these two northern States in Mexico. Please have press say that no perishable goods of any kind should be sent at present. The most appropriate food for the common people who are suffering is shelled corn, rice and beans, in bags, which can be reshipped to small towns as soon as railroads open and cart trains can get through. All kinds of simple, plain clothing (such as will go out of date in the United States with the season) for women and children. Charitable societies and churches can collect large amounts of good second-hand clothing, and shoes, blankets and light-weight bedding can be used in large amounts, as the cool weather will soon be on. Manufacturers can send these, in large and small amounts, free of duty and free of express. Charitable societies and churches can collect large amounts of clothing, etc., which will save much suffering and fully meet the demands of many people. Many of the manufacturers and merchants can contribute boxes of common cooking utensils, like coffeepots, metallic dishes and kettles. These are greatly needed for starting the people to housekeeping again. We need at least five thousand cheap blankets, to protect the people in northern Mexico from cold weather. I hope and pray and beg that all our people act, and act promptly. They can all arrange for free freights and express."

ALVEY A. ADEE,
Acting Secretary of State.

This was followed within twenty-four hours by the following dispatch, giving a fuller idea of the terrible destitution of the people:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 19, 1909.

Consul-General Hanna, at Monterey, telegraphs this morning: "The flood extended over the two States of Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas and parts of two other States. Railroads have been so badly demolished that up to now it is impossible to correctly estimate actual loss of life, number of homeless or amount of loss of property. We only know that the conditions are terrible, and it is believed that thousands lost their lives. Many thousands are homeless and in a territory containing nearly a million people nearly all have sustained some loss. We are sending out supplies as fast as the railroads are opened, and are arranging mule trains to carry the provisions beyond the end of the road. The consuls at Matamoras and Tampico are hard at work, and I am backing them to the best of my ability. Have placed money at their disposal. The Mexican Red Cross appears to be well organized and composed of energetic and worthy people. I am co-operating with them and other general committees, all of which appears to be greatly appreciated."

Consul-General Hanna telegraphed Dr. Klopsch, personally: "The flood covered the States of Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas and parts of two other States in Mexico, a territory containing about a million people, most all of whom have suffered directly or indirectly from the flood. Please say to American manufacturers and merchants that one hundred sewing machines, of good but simple sort; two hundred washtubs, two hundred washboards and two hundred sets of flatirons are greatly needed for flooded suffering women, to enable them to go to work and earn their living; most of these women have lost their husbands and supporters, but are willing to work. PHILIP C. HANNA."

In view of the foregoing telegrams we would again remind the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the great opportunity to show not only our friendship as a nation, but the spirit of true Christian charity and brotherhood to these Southern neighbors of ours in Mexico. Every contribution, no matter how small, will be the means of saving precious lives. Send in your contributions to-day to the Mexican Relief Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City. Style and Simplicity

McCall Pattern No. 2996

THE secret of the popularity and success of McCall Patterns is the latest and most popular styles, combined with absolute simplicity.

Have you had troubles and disappointments with your patterns?

Have you made dresses for yourself and your daughters, following the patterns as closely as you could, only to find, when you were through, that the garment was not at all like the fashion plate? That is not your fault. The trouble is that the pattern was either incorrect or so complicated and hard to understand that mistakes were unavoidable. Do not be discouraged.

TRY McCALL PATTERNS

They are absolutely accurate. They are so simple that you cannot misunderstand them---there is nothing about them to puzzle even a beginner. Any woman or girl who knows how to sew can follow them with ease, and secure a result which is precisely like the fashion plate.

You will not only be sure that the style is irreproachable, but you will save yourself a great deal of trouble and hard work. You will save money, too.

McCall Patterns cost but 10c and 15c—None Higher

You will save material---McCall Patterns look out for that.

The very latest American and foreign styles, interpreted by a highly paid staff of the most skilled and expert designers, and embodying every possible feature of refinement and elegance, are represented in these famous patterns. They are sold by nearly 10,000 dealers in all parts of the country. If you do not find them readily, we will supply you direct at the regular price. No extra charge for postage.

Mildred's Answer to Prayer

A True Story by KATE UPSON CLARK

A CHAPEL was in progress of building for a certain Baptist church in a small inland city. Suddenly hard times came on. The work on the chapel had to stop, and it seemed as though it might never be resumed.

The men of the church felt this keenly; but the women were even more affected. They needed the chapel sorely. They had looked forward to its completion with delight. They felt that they could not give it up.

At once, they began measures to raise the two thousand dollars required to finish it. Entertainments were planned, and a subscription paper was enthusiastically circulated.

The organist of the little church was Miss Mildred Ensign. She was the only child of her widowed mother, who had but a small income to live upon. They owned their little cottage, and Mildred earned enough to support herself by taking music pupils. She received nothing at all for playing the organ. It was with her a labor of deepest love.

When the paper reached her, she hesitated. She wanted to put down $100. At last, she wrote $25.

"Why, my dear daughter!" cried her mother, "I felt that I had done more than I could afford when I put down $5. It is the hardest winter we have ever had. Where are you going to get $25 to give away?"

"I don't know, mother," she said bravely. "But I want so much to do it, and I am willing to work so hard, that I know God will somehow give it to me."

The days went on. Mildred lost several pupils through the stress of the panic; but she was praying night and day for the money to pay her subscription, and she felt that she should be heard. She turned and darned her clothing. She had her old shoes half-soled. She economized as she had never done before; and still she and her mother were scarcely able to meet their necessary expenses.

One day a gentleman and his wife appeared at the door of the Ensign cottage.

"We wish to buy a piano," they said, "but we know nothing of such matters. One of the men of this city in whom we have confidence has told us that you are an expert in pianos. Will you come with us and help us to choose wisely?"

Mildred was kind and generous, and she dearly loved music. She gladly went.

After the piano was selected, the gentleman urged her to allow him to pay her something for her time and trouble; but she could not bear to take anything from him. They had had a good time together, and that, she said, was ample reward.

The next day she received a note, asking her to call upon the music-dealers at whose store the piano had been purchased. She had known them for years, and had often bought music from them.

"We want to thank you, Miss Ensign," they said, "for the way in which you sold for us yesterday that fine and expensive piano. We wish you to take this check in partial return for what you did for us."

She protested and told them how she had declined to take anything from the gentleman himself; but they insisted, and said that an agent was always entitled to his commission. She took the check at last.

She did not look at it until she reached home. Then, what was her joy to find that it was for exactly twenty-five dollars, the very amount of her subscription!

"My prayer was heard, mother!" she cried joyfully, and they fell on their knees together and thanked God.

THE NAMING OF THE W. C. T. U.

AN interesting letter has been received at this office from the Ohio branch of the W. C. T. U. It is signed by the president and other officers of the Ohio organization, and is full of valuable details of the early days of its history.

The occasion of the letter is the article published in this journal in August, 1908, upon Mrs. Sophia E. Sanford, a prominent temperance worker and organizer, of Fredonia, N. Y., who had then but just died.

Mrs. Sanford, judging from her own letters, which were quoted in the local papers at that time, certainly believed that she had first invented the famous name of our women's greatest temperance society. The Ohio ladies, upon investigation, found that the original copies of the Fredonia Censor, which reported the first meetings of Mrs. Sanford's society, leave out the word "Christian" from the title. This may possibly have been done by an irresponsible editor, who wanted to save space. These original copies, becoming scarce, were reprinted from the file, as they were in considerable demand. In this reduplication it is claimed that some one seized the opportunity to insert the word "Christian" into the society's name, though it was not in the original draft.

The Ohio society, like that of Fredonia, owes its inspiration to the lectures of Dr. Dio Lewis in December, 1873. All of the State was set on fire by them, and many active "crusades" were started.

In February, 1874, Dr. Lewis called "The Crusaders' Convention" at Columbus. In April, 1874, steps were taken to form a permanent organization, as an outgrowth of the crusade.

At Delaware, O., June 3, 1874, a constitution was submitted for consideration. It contained the tentative name "Woman's Temperance Union," and was drafted by Mrs. H. C. McCabe. Mrs. William Little, of Delaware, said, "Put in the word 'Christian,'" which was done.

This constitution was ratified by a mass convention at Springfield, O., on June 17, 1874.

A national convention was held at Cleveland, O., in November, 1874. Here Fredonia, N. Y., was represented. A meeting had been held in Chautauqua, N. Y., during the summer of 1874, and some sort of a State organization had been effected; but this was after the Ohio organization, which therefore claims the honor of first conceiving and using the full name, "Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

The Ohio women do not accuse Mrs. Sanford of falsifying. They simply think that she was mistaken. Perhaps others can explain this apparent discrepancy in dates and claims.

Called Higher

Called higher, Mrs. P. H. Snyder, of Sunbury, Pa., at the age of eighty-two.

Lawrence Watson, of Nelson, Pa., was called higher a short time ago, at the age of eighty. He served gallantly in the war to preserve the Union, and was a faithful member of the Methodist Church.

Died at Marion, Ia., S. A. Garrett, at the age of eighty-four. He was long a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mrs. Mary E. Garrett, aged seventy-nine years, entered into rest January 6, 1909. She was for over thirty years a member of the Presbyterian Church.

Helping the Pastor*

ONE great object that all Christians should work to promote is to make the calling of the ministry more attractive to our bright young men. When we see many of our clergy struggling to keep soul and body together on meagre salaries; their children educated only by the most heroic exertions, or by charity, if at all; their clothing shabby and insufficient; their congregations critical, divided, and very likely dismissing their pastor after two or three years of heart-sickening labor on his part to please them; then we are not surprised that many of our promising youth elect to go into other professions than preaching. And yet we want the best for this great work.

Make the life of your minister as comfortable as you can. Every church should have its parsonage, and should keep it in prime order. See that you contribute generously to the Society for Ministerial Relief. If the poor minister can look forward to a pension for his old age, it is a vast moral support to him.

Encouragement is necessary in all lines of work; but perhaps it is more needed in the ministry than elsewhere. This does not mean that you should overload your pastor with insincere and unmerited compliments. It simply means that whenever you see that he has done a successful work, or overcome some obstacle, you should congratulate him. Show him that you stand ready to back him up in every good enterprise. The feeling that he can depend upon you, and that you are ready to hold up his hands, will be worth far more to him than any amount of flattery.

Your minister will probably have faults. He is only human, like the rest of us. But keep your eyes fixed persistently upon his good points. Help him to develop them. The chances then are that his faults will diminish. For instance, it is seldom that the same man excels both in preaching and in pastoral work. Suppose his sermons are his weak point. Perhaps by thoughtfulness you can strengthen him there. If you find that he is thinking of preaching on a certain subject, perhaps you can lend him books or clippings which may help him. Or comment upon any especially bright or appropriate thought or illustration which he may have used in a sermon. This may give him a hint for future work.

If he excels in preaching, but neglects to visit the families of his flock, adapt your methods to that situation. And never forget to pray for him.

In Queen Victoria's jubilee celebration, in 1897, along the procession's line of march there was a stand occupied by certain veteran officers of the army. They had braved many perils for their country, but every trial had only strengthened their loyalty. When the Queen came opposite their stand they cheered lustily. She bowed graciously, pausing perceptibly in her course to show her appreciation of their love and service. So overcome were these grizzled veterans by their monarch's kindness that, as she passed on, they all burst into tears.

A hundred or more years ago the minister in America occupied in each community almost the position of royalty, and a word or even look of approval from him stirred its recipient deeply. He was usually the most highly educated man there—sometimes the only educated man. Now this is all changed. But the great King still reigns over us all. We are his soldiers, and the honoring and upholding of his ministers is a part of our loyalty to him.

The Forgiven Unforgiving*

THERE are few of us who are not ready to forgive those who come to us with words of repentance and beseeching. The unforgiving servant in our lesson is, therefore, a rather exceptional type, as men average in their relations to each other, though he is a common enough type as men may be considered in their relation to God.

Our great difficulty comes when we are called upon to forgive an injury to one who makes no pretense to sorrow or repentance. A proper self-respect seems to demand that we maintain a dignified aloofness from our enemy until he apologizes for his insults; and yet here is our Lord's command, clear and strong.

One man who tried always to obey literally every divine injunction, wrote to one who had deeply wronged him, "I wish you to know that I cherish no ill-will against you. From my soul I forgive you for the harm you have done me."

He received the bitter reply, "You can keep your 'forgiveness' to yourself. I do not want it."

Would it possibly have been the more dignified course for the forgiving man to have "hid in his heart" the pardon? Or was it better that he laid open his feelings and received an additional blow from the churl who had wronged him?

It was said of Archbishop Cranmer that a by-word in his time was the saying, "Do my lord of Canterbury an ill turn and you make him your friend forever."

One of the many beautiful stories told of his inability to cherish malice was of a plot to kill him. One of the miscreants concerned lived in his own palace. Another was a man whom he had greatly served. By chance, papers revealing their design fell into the archbishop's hands. He called them to him, and told them that he had discovered a plot against his life. They professed horror and hoped that whoever had dared to think of such a thing might meet the fate which he deserved. Sick at heart over their perfidy, the good archbishop offered a prayer of thanksgiving for his deliverance and begged for the divine pardon for his wicked enemies. He then showed them the proofs of their treachery. They fell on their knees and besought his mercy. He raised them up, assured them of his full forgiveness, administered a kind reproof to them, and never afterward alluded to their fault.

In one of his most beautiful poems Tennyson pictures the visit of the stainless king to his beloved but false Guinevere. He recalls to her his early life—how he had been the "first of all the kings" to draw together the knighthood-errant of the realm, and pledge them "to break the heathen and uphold the Christ," and to live lives of purity and high endeavor; then his anguish when his beloved knights, Lancelot and Tristram, had proven untrue to those vows; and, lastly, his heart-break at her treachery. He concludes:

Yet think not that I come to urge thy crimes: . . .
Lo, I forgive thee, as Eternal God
Forgives! . . .
Perchance, and so thou purify thy soul,
And so thou lean on our fair father Christ,
Hereafter in that world where all are pure,
We two may meet before high God.

Overcome by his magnanimity, she resolves to live worthy of it, and at last, "for her good deeds," she was made the abbess of the convent in which she had taken refuge. Who can doubt that God forgave her, and that in another world (for the poet has made the story seem true to us) her husband met her, with the old love? Thus may we all forgive, and receive the eternal reward.

Greatest BUILDING MATERIAL OFFER Ever Published!

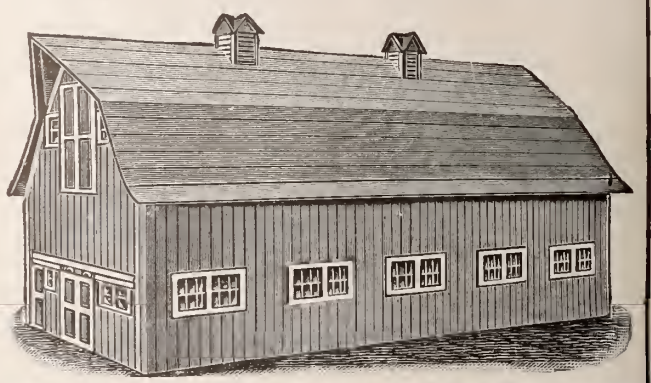
$650 BUYS THE MATERIAL To BUILD THIS HOUSE

¶ This is our leader, the best seller of any house ever designed anywhere, by anybody, at any price. Why? Because it comes nearer to filling the requirements of a home than any house of its size ever built. It is 23 ft. wide and 33 ft. 6 in. long, not including the porch. It has seven rooms, bath, pantry and a large front porch. It is of handsome appearance and symmetrical proportions. It is magnificently lighted and perfectly ventilated. Embodies every modern comfort and convenience. Our extremely low price makes it the best bargain proposition on the market. We cannot recommend this design too highly. Even if you don't need a home, build this home for an investment. You can sell it 10 times over before it's finished.

This is our house design No. 6; refer to it by number when you write.

$498 BUYS THE MATERIAL TO BUILD THIS BARN

¶ The above is an illustration of our famous Joist Frame Barn. It is the most practical and serviceable barn ever designed. It may be built at a price very much cheaper, and has more available space, than any other style. We can supply this barn in six different sizes, all of the uniform width of 36 ft. The above quotation covers a barn 36 ft. wide by 48 ft. long and 18 ft. high. The roof is of the self-supporting type, there being no posts in the hay loft. There are 6 windows on each side, 3 in each end. and 2 in each gable, so the barn is thoroughly ventilated. Our price covers all the lumber, mill work, hardware and nails required to complete this building from the ground up. We can also furnish this design in larger sizes.



Refer to this Barn as Design No. 221

We Have Houses Ranging from $290 to $1300, Barns from $200 up

¶ Of all wonderful offers advertised, this unquestionably is the greatest. The Chicago House Wrecking Company offers to sell you at a saving of from 25 to 50 per cent all the building material needed to construct the house and barn shown above. This means we are absolutely leaving out all middlemen's profits and are dealing direct with the consumer. Our ideas are absolutely original, and no other firm in the world has ever before advertised to completely supply the material such as is offered herewith. We are the largest concern in the world selling lumber and building material direct to the consumer. We propose to furnish you everything for the construction of these buildings as outlined in our offer. It will be in accordance with specifications which are so clear that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Our prices as given above means for the material all correctly laid out in accordance with our plans and specifications.

¶ We will furnish you an itemized material list. We will also supply blue prints, architect's specifications and full information needed to properly and economically erect these buildings.

This is not an experiment with us. During the past year, we have sold upwards of five hundred complete homes and barns. All the material is stored right in our main warehouse and yards at Chicago, ready to ship promptly upon receipt of your order. We guarantee every stick furnished to be absolutely brand new. Don't pay any attention to what jealous lumber dealers or unscrupulous merchants may tell you to the contrary. We would not dare to advertise any false statement. If you buy a building and receive any material that is in any way, shape or manner to the contrary of our general and specific representation, we guarantee to take back such material at our expense and replace it with material strictly in accordance with our description, or to refund you the full purchase price of same, or make such adjustment as meets your entire approval.

¶ As to our terms: They are as liberal as any one can ask for. If you do not want to send money in advance, we will make shipment, to be paid for after it reaches destination, provided you furnish us with absolutely satisfactory bank references.

¶ Our literature explains, fully, our operations. On application we will furnish you the names of hundreds of satisfied customers in all parts of the country. On request we will quote a price delivered, freight prepaid, at your railroad shipping point, thus there will be no question as to the ultimate cost of the material. You will know all the facts before you buy. We are not asking you to buy a "cat in the bag." You will see what you buy with open eyes, and we will prove our terms are as liberal as you can possibly ask for.

¶ We secure many standard stocks of lumber, building material and merchandise at various forced sales, besides controlling large quantities of the lumber secured direct from mills in the North, South and Pacific Coast.

¶ Our yards cover over forty acres of land. Our institution is known everywhere. When you deal with us you are saving big money. Thousands have saved in the past and are now our steady patrons. It stands to reason that we are bound to give you a square, honorable deal. We are business men and recognize the meaning of a satisfied customer. If you deal once, you will buy from us often. Write for detailed information.

BLUE PRINTS FOR ANY OF OUR DESIGNS FREE to PURCHASERS

¶ We will furnish you blue prints for either of these designs or for any of the designs shown in our "Book of Plans" without one cent of cost to you, provided you place the order for the bill of material with us. It will be accompanied by working plans and material list. The itemized material list accompanying same is complete, both in the description of the material used and also in describing the purpose for which each item is intended. If purchased in the usual way from the architect, these plans would cost from $25.00 to $75.00. With the aid of our plans, specifications and material list, anyone reasonably familiar with building construction can superintend the erection of his own house or barn at a great saving.

¶ Our Plan Book, a description of which is given below, illustrates many other designs in houses and barns. You will find that our houses can be built for such purposes as will bring you in good returns for your money, even if you have no intention of living in the house yourself.

¶ If you buy the building material from us, at our specified prices, we will furnish you the plans, specifications and material list without charge. If, however, you prefer first to receive the plans and study the possibility of applying same for your own particular use, then we make you the following proposition:

¶ We will furnish you with a set complete for either of the buildings above or for any of the buildings shown in our "Book of Plans" referred to elsewhere in this advertisement for the sum of $2.00, which amount you can remit to us and the complete set will be sent to you, all carrying charges prepaid by us. Upon receipt of them, if you decide to make the purchase of the full bill from us, then we will allow you $2.00 to apply towards our price. If for any reason you decide not to use the plans and prefer to return them to us within thirty days after receipt, then we will refund you $1.50, thus making the information cost you only 50 cents. We assure you this does not pay for the expense involved.

Hot Water Heating Plants, Steam Heating Plants, Plumbing Material

¶ We will furnish a complete Hot Water Heating Plant for the design No. 6, shown above, consisting of Sectional Hot Water Heater, handsome Cast Iron Radiators, all necessary pipe, valves and fittings, including a complete set of blue prints, working drawings and complete specifications, so simple that any ordinary mechanic handy with the use of tools can easily install plant. We will also loan the necessary tools needed in putting in such a plant. At the same time we will furnish you with a written, binding guarantee, covering 365 days, making you perfectly safe as to the quality of our material. We will supply all the above for the sum of $216.50; or we will furnish you a Steam Heating Plant, similar description as above, for the sum of $180.80. Every bit of material used in these plants is guaranteed brand new and first-class in every particular. We furnish all needed Plumbing Fixtures for House No. 6, shown in this advertisement, and consisting of Bath Tub, Closet, Washstand, Kitchen Sink, and including all necessary pipe and trimmings complete to install everything needed above the ground, for the sum of $97.50. Bathroom Outfit like illustration is $37.50.

¶ Any mechanic handy with the use of tools can install both the plumbing and the heating material in this house. We can also quote you prices for the installation of Plumbing and Heating for any of the designs shown in our "Book of Plans."

¶ We will furnish you the paint needed for House Design No. 6, shown above, including hard oil finish for interior, two coat work, and including porch floor paint, for $26.50.

¶ We will furnish a Hot Air Furnace outfit for design No. 6, full specifications of which will be furnished you, for $99.30.

¶ Our special Heating Catalog explains fully just what we include on all heating jobs. We can supply Heating Apparatus and Plumbing material for any house, new or old. Write for our descriptive matter and handsomely illustrated booklet.

LUMBER and BUILDING MATERIAL at 25 to 50 Per Cent SAVING

We say to you positively that no matter what your wants in the line of building material, we can supply it, and always at a saving. This statement is backed by any number of unsolicited testimonials from those who have taken advantage of our liberal offers of the past. Especially do we urge you to act now. Never in years has lumber been offered at such low prices as we are offering it for at the present time, and it is good lumber, too, first-class, right up to grade, and as good or better than that carried by any local dealer anywhere. Every stick of lumber that we sell is new. Nothing "wrecked" about it. It is as good as can be bought. We haven't a piece of second-hand lumber in our stock, and if we did have it we would not sell it by mail. We are selling only new, clean stock, no shop-worn material, and all our grades are guaranteed.

Then, our MILL-WORK. You cannot improve its quality. It's as good as anyone wants. It's better than 90 per cent of the dealers have for sale. We can furnish you every single thing you may need in the line of Doors, Sash, Mouldings, Sideboards, Mantels, Interior Trim, or anything else. In other words, each and every article that comes into the construction of a building of any kind, and that includes also Structural Iron, Iron Beams, Iron Columns, or anything else in the Iron line.

We have a complete stock of ROOFING MATERIAL, both tin, steel, iron and ready-roofing. We can furnish you shingles in all grades, everything in the way of plumbing and heating material. We can supply your wants in Builders' Hardware at a saving of 25 per cent or more. We mean your Nails, your Builders' Hardware and your Tools. And so it goes all the way down the line of material you need. We save you money everywhere, and the way to convince you of this fact is to have you submit to us a list of building material that you are in the market for. Let your carpenter or contractor, or whoever has charge of your building operations, hand us a list of the material you need, and we will give you a prompt estimate. We will, on application, name you prices, freight prepaid.

We will show you by actual proof that we can do everything we say in this advertisement. There isn't a single overdrawn statement in this advertisement. Send us today your list of lumber and building material. Give us an opportunity to figure with you.

POLAR HEROES WELCOMED HOME

DR. FREDERICK A. COOK and Commander Robert E. Peary, the two conquerors of the Pole, have returned from the Arctic, and are again safe at home among welcoming friends. Dr. Cook was the first to reach American soil. He crossed the Atlantic from Copenhagen on the steamship Oscar II., and on reaching New York waters, on September 21, found such an ovation awaiting him as the metropolis has not witnessed in many years. Excursion steamers, tugs and many other craft went down the bay to meet the incoming vessel and gave the wanderer a rousing welcome. He was transferred in the upper bay from the big liner to the tug John K. Gilkinson, on which were his wife and children, eagerly awaiting him. After a most affecting greeting by Mrs. Cook and the children, and a small group of relatives, the explorer was taken on board another steamer, on which was a delegation of his enthusiastic fellow-townsmen from Brooklyn. The modest little doctor was now subjected to a test of hand-shaking and vociferous greeting, from which he would willingly have shrunk, but the popular enthusiasm would not be denied. The cheering crowd almost covered him with bouquets, and one young woman pushed to the front and hung a garland of splendid roses around his neck, the smiling explorer meanwhile being so tightly wedged in by the pressure of the crowd that he could do little more than nod his thanks. During the sail up the bay his steamer was greeted by the multitudinous shrieks of steam-whistles and other more or less deafening noises, which continued till he reached Brooklyn. There he became the guest of the citizens and, while being hurried along in an automobile that was gay with bunting, took a flying observation of the decorations along the line of streets leading to his home.

His home-coming—the last stage of his return journey—must have struck the explorer as in singular contrast with the bleak, deathlike solitude he traversed on the last stage of his famous polar dash, a year ago. For nearly four miles in his home city the pavements were crowded with thousands of cheering boys and girls and their elders, all eager to see the hero who had planted "Old Glory" at the Pole. In Bushwick Avenue a triumphal arch, bearing the legend, "We Believe in You," and decorated with polar scenes, had been erected in front of his old residence and office. His faithful wife, smiling and proud of her husband's fame, shared with him all the honors of the return. And after the eventful day, with its tumultuous crowds, its receptions and dinners, was ended Dr. Cook was taken to a suite of rooms at the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York City. He was the guest of the Arctic Club at a banquet on September 23, at which Admiral Schley and many other distinguished Americans were present.

He had little to say regarding the controversy with Commander Peary. He stated that he had brought with him all the records necessary to establish his claim as discoverer of the Pole. Duplicates of these records, and some of the original observations, are in the care of Mr. Harry Whitney, who is expected to return from his Northern hunting trip in October. These observations and Dr. Cook's instruments will be sent to the University of Copenhagen for examination, and will afterward be forwarded to this country, where the various scientific bodies will have access to them. He will not submit any fragmentary report or partial observations, but the whole must be judged in its entirety. In a typewritten statement to the press, Dr. Cook said:

"The public will be given the tangible and specific record of my trip. . . . I have not come home to enter into argument with one man, or fifty men, but I am to present a clear record of a piece of work for which I have a right to display a certain amount of pride. When scientists study the detailed observations and the narrative in its consecutive order I am certain that, in due course of events, all will be compelled to admit the truth of my statements. I am perfectly willing to abide the verdict on this record by competent judges. . . . Furthermore, I will bring to America witnesses to prove that I have been to the Pole."

Commander Peary arrived in Sydney, N. S., on Tuesday, September 21, where he received a generous welcome, afloat and ashore. His vessel, the Roosevelt, was in gala dress and there was a touching scene when the explorer's wife and children came aboard and greeted him after the long separation. Peary and his party were welcomed by the town officials of Sydney. Concerts and fireworks filled out the rest of the day. Next morning the Commander left for Portland, where he had a great public reception and was hailed as "the discoverer of the Pole." Before leaving Sydney he issued a public card of thanks to his friends for kind offers and invitations, but said he would decline all public functions and ovations until the present controversy between Dr. Cook and himself could be settled by competent authorities.

THE PEARL OF PEARLS

TEXT: Matt. 13: 45, 46—"The kingdom of heaven is like a merchantman seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it."

FROM an early period pearls have ranked highest among gems and have been highly esteemed as ornaments. The Greeks and Romans used them in profusion, and even decorated their feet with pearls. Pliny, after referring to the prodigal display of pearls in his time, adds: "Even more than this, they put them on their feet, and that not merely on the laces of their sandals, but they must needs tramp on them, and walk with them under foot as well." He alludes to the breastplate which Cæsar brought home and dedicated to Venus Genetrix, saying that it was formed of British pearls, which confirms the statement of Suetonius that pearls were Cæsar's chief inducement for his British expeditions. The pearls in the eardrops of Cleopatra, the beautiful but infamous queen of Egypt, which she proposed to dissolve in vinegar at a costly repast, the subject of a wager, were valued at about $400,000; and the strongest proof which Roman historians have to give of the wanton and boundless extravagance of some of their emperors is the fact that they dissolved pearls in vinegar and drank them with their wine.

The Dewy, Translucent Pearl

The glory of the land of Havilah, surrounded by one of Eden's rivers, is described as due to "gold and bdellium and the onyx stone." This bdellium is probably our pearl—for, says an ancient writer, "a stone has been found in the Indian Seas, called bdellius, that had its origin from a certain dew, which, being cast into the ocean, was after a while gathered encrusted with shell, and found to be transformed into a jewel." As this is the most ancient view of the formation of the pearl, we may take it for granted that, in addition to all the glories of Eden, it had pearls and precious stones. When Christ warned his disciples to beware how they wasted truths of the highest value on such as could not appreciate them, he said: "Neither cast ye your pearls before swine."

W. Y. Fullerton, in God's Jewels, has gathered together much curious learning about pearls, and details the theories of their formation current in antiquity—the fish conceived the pearl from the dew of heaven, and according to the quality of the dew it was pure, or round, or cloudy, or deformed with specks; and the state of the atmosphere at the time of conception, and the hour of the day had great influence on their size and color. And this notion, strange to say, of attributing the pearl to the distilling dew, so widely current in the East, was also found by Columbus in the West. Gotthold, in his Emblems, says: "The pearl, as most naturalists inform us, is the product of the dew of heaven, for when the oyster sees the weather bright and clear it is said to open its shell to the early dawn, while the dew is falling, greedy to drink in the silver drops, which petrify within it, and afterward, by their white and snowy lustre, betray their celestial origin."

In a New Jersey glass factory I saw a workman take a piece of glass out of one furnace and put it into the second, and by and by into a third and then a fourth. I said to him, "Why do you put this glass into so many fires?" "Oh," he answered, "neither the first fire, nor the second, nor the third was hot enough, and so I put it into the fourth, and that made it transparent." And so, when we are come to the other side and look back upon the fires through which we have passed here, in the clear light of God's glory we shall see that if God had spared us from the fires of trial on this side we should never have come to the enjoyments of the redeemed. Here the cross, yonder the crown!

Hidden Wealth

Wealth in this country is measured by the size of a man's bank account, his money in bonds and banks, or expended in houses, or the number of acres in his estate. It is quite different in many parts of the East. There, as described by a well-known traveler, you enter a house with walls of clay and thatch of straw, or reeds, or palm leaves; and in its tenant—who sits simply attired, and amid the scantiest furnishings, cross-legged on a rug which, spread out on the floor, forms his seat by day and his bed by night—there you find a wealthy man. He has his money invested in jewels, and not without good reason. Those countries are liable to sudden invasions and violent revolutions, and it is in the form of jewels that property is most securely because most secretly kept, and in the case of flight most easily removed. Hidden in a woman's hair a fortune has often been carried from place to place in the East, and it is only by taking this fact into account, that, while with us little less than ornaments, precious stones are there a form of money and often of immense wealth, that we rise to an adequate idea of the value which Christ puts on his people in calling them his jewels, or of the full meaning of the figure that represents the blessings of his salvation as one pearl of great price, which all other pearls and property should be sold to buy.

The Emblem of Salvation

Besides its money value, a pearl is a beautiful emblem of salvation in another respect—look at its color, of snowy whiteness, a purity unclouded by the slightest haze, and a form so rounded and polished and perfected that it is impossible of improvement. The lapidary, to whose grinding skill the diamond owes much of its brilliancy and those many-colored fires with which it burns and shines, may not touch a pearl. What an emblem, therefore, is this gem of that salvation which came perfect from the hand of God—without any admixture of error, and which no thought of ours, however advanced, and no progress of time, however remarkably brilliant, can ever improve.

The pearl diver will sometimes dive eight times before he gets an oyster, though at other times he will bring up three or even five—two in each hand and one under his arm. If he gets twenty-five in a day he makes a good average, though sometimes he finds a hundred—not a hundred pearls, but a hundred oyster shells, and perhaps five thousand of these will be opened and not yield twenty-five dollars' worth of pearls; while, on the other hand, there have been found as many as one hundred and fifty pearls in one shell. This very uncertainty lends a zest to the toil, for no one can say but that, in spite of ninety-nine failures, the one hundredth attempt may compensate for all the past.

In Pearling Life we are told that in Australian fisheries "the quantity of shells brought up varies with the disposition prevailing among men, the happy mood generally producing the best results." The dispirited and downcast Christian worker, who always can see "a moral interregnum at hand," is sure to fail. Toiling on and catching nothing, the risen Lord will in his own time direct you to the right side of the ship. He who could bring up a fish with money in its mouth can show us the oysters with pearls.

The Spread of Christianity

Dispel all fear about Christianity. The times never were so full of promise as they are now. The most hostile theories against Christianity have been speedily abandoned, and the best thought of the age bows reverently to the claims of Christ. The enemies of Christianity have striven among themselves, and fiercely demolished one another. The "higher criticism" of Paulus soon surrendered to that of the more critical Strauss. The mythical theory of Strauss was in turn destroyed by the æsthetic Renan. The legendary theory of Renan has fallen to pieces of its own inconsistencies. Baur, Hilgenfeld and Schwegler, like sappers and miners with pickaxe and powder, went forth to subvert Christianity, but they have only disclosed the Gibraltar strength of her foundations.

Voltaire said he lived in the twilight of Christianity. He told the truth, although he meant a lie. He did live in its twilight, but not, as he meant to say, the evening twilight; it was the twilight before the morning. Voltaire and his theories have sunk into the night of the past. Christianity lives in the twilight of the present. He, too, boasted that he would overthrow with one hand the fabric of Christianity, which required the hands of the twelve apostles to build up, and to-day the press which he employed to print his blasphemies is used in printing the Bible, and the house in which he lived is packed with Bibles from garret to cellar, as a depot for the Bible Society. Gibbon labored earnestly to overthrow Christianity, yet to-day Gibbon's hotel, at Lake Leman, contains a room where Bibles are sold. Chesterfield's parlor, formerly an infidel club-room, echoing with profanity and raillery at the Christian religion, is now a vestry where the groans and prayers of the penitent go up to God. Tom Paine thought he had demolished the Bible, but after his death, in 1809, the Book took such a leap that since that time more than twenty-five times as many Bibles have been made and scattered through the world as were ever made before since the creation of man.

Christianity and civilization are identical. The one cannot be carried forward without the other. Wherever go the swift ships, wherever stretch the electric wires or the iron rails, there goes the cross, the grand magnetic centre of the creation of God. Church bells are ringing everywhere; grand cathedrals are rising on every shore and plain; on wilds and continents unknown Christ is setting up his throne. Christianity is making inroads everywhere and is spreading most in the most advanced and cultured nations. This is not the case with Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Confucianism and Brahmanism. They burrow among the superstitious and uncultured. China, the most populous and wealthy of all heathen nations, compelled by the force of circumstances to open her doors to the outside world, has been penetrated by missionary pioneers to Tibet on the west and Burma on the south, and fully one-half of its provinces from Hong Kong and Canton to Peking have been occupied by a chain of missions which take in the principal cities of the empire. Japan, in its thirst for progress and improvement, is rapidly becoming a Christian nation. In the Mohammedan countries, from the Balkan Mountains on the north to Bagdad on the south, from Egypt on the west to Persia on the east, central points in the most prominent cities have been established for the evangelization of the Moslem population.

A Conquering Gospel

All the great religions are going down, while the glad tidings proclaimed to the shepherds on Judea's plains are spread abroad as never before. With the Bible translated into more than three hundred different languages and dialects, with missionary stations planted on every shore, with dark continents opened for the heralds of salvation, with long isolated nations unbarring their gates and flinging open wide their moss-grown portals, with the isles of the sea stretching out their hands to God, with servants and handmaidens on whom the Spirit of God has been poured out, flying as on the wings of the wind to bear the message of salvation to a lost world, with all the appliances of modern science and the activities of modern enterprise and intellect, the way is sure for the Gospel of Christ to reach the very ends of the earth.

As the seekers of pearls make everything bend to their one absorbing purpose, and live only for that, so must we learn to pass through things temporal with our hearts set all the time on things eternal. Then shall we be willing to make sacrifices that others may be blessed. The Princess Eugenia of Sweden, feeling the need of a hospital for the poor of Stockholm, and realizing the impossibility of getting money to build one, nobly gave up her jewels that they might be sold to obtain the necessary funds. Some time afterward she visited the hospital raised by her bounty, and when she saw how many had been rescued as the result of her sacrifice exclaimed: "Here are my jewels back again!" This truly royal incident carries with it a world of suggestion to those children of the King who may be so circumstanced as to be willing and able to imitate it.

Heavenly Jewels

The eldest daughter in a fashionable house was dressed ready for a ball when the little sister, seeing the flashing gems in her hair, climbed on a chair, and, her arms wound round her neck, said, "Sissie, shall you have any jewels in your crown when you get to heaven?" She did not answer, but when she got to the assembly nothing seemed right to her: the lights burned dimly, the music was discordant, and the dancing lagged, until, thoroughly disgusted, she ordered her carriage early and came home. Going straight to her little sister's bedroom and throwing herself on the bed, she awoke her and said, "Sissie, you shall have one jewel in your crown, for

THE WHITE RIBBONERS' CONVENTION

THE gathering of the white-ribbon delegates at Omaha, Neb., for the thirty-sixth annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union heralds the close of a very active and successful year of temperance endeavor.

The beginning of temperance work has been made in the Canal Zone; the campaign for submission of the prohibition question to the people has been won in Florida; New Mexico has come into line, the capital city, Santa Fé, having passed an ordinance to abolish saloon licenses after January 1, 1910; fifteen new dry counties have been won in South Carolina, where only six dispensary counties remain, and State-wide prohibition is expected from the next Legislature; Idaho County, Idaho (the largest county in the whole United States, it is said), has been carried for "no saloons"; Nebraska, Iowa, the District of Columbia, Kentucky, Missouri, Oregon, Arizona, Indiana, Delaware, South Dakota, Virginia, Louisiana, Ohio, Utah are all organized by temperance workers for "no saloons in 1910." Tennessee has joined the ranks of Prohibition States, making nine in all.

The 1909 W. C. T. U. convention is one of planning and preparation for next year, when many States, as has been indicated, are to be the scene of vigorous campaigns to abolish the saloon. In Indiana, where more than two-thirds of the population of the State already live in dry territory, an effort is now being made to have a prohibitory amendment submitted to the people. In Delaware, two of the three counties have prohibition and the third, New Castle, is asking for a special election on the question. No-license territory has been greatly increased in Arizona, and a strong fight is to be made for prohibition in Statehood. Ninety-six of the one hundred and nineteen counties in Kentucky have banished the saloon under local option and the campaign is on for State prohibition. All the temperance organizations of Missouri are united in the Missouri Constitutional Amendment Association to abolish the saloon. New York State has its first dry county (Yates), and more are to be added. South Dakota legislators are pledged to refer the New Church Federation's bill for local option to the people in 1910. Resubmission of the prohibition amendment is demanded in Vermont.

These are a few of the pressing legislative movements in which the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is actively enlisted in various parts of the United States, of which but one-third now remains open to the liquor traffic.

One of the most interesting new endeavors of the W. C. T. U. is the Independent Japanese Coast Work (whose third mission has been recently erected), led by Rev. Mary A. Bowen, of California. The Japanese women are actively at work, and fly the white emblem of temperance and purity with great enthusiasm.

Signal work has been accomplished this year by Mrs. Edith Smith Davis, of Wisconsin, and Mrs. Martha M. Allen, of New York, heads respectively of the departments of scientific temperance instruction and of medical temperance and representatives of the Woman's organization at the great International Temperance Congress in London last July. A novel and helpful course of study in scientific temperance instruction has been planned by Mrs. Davis for the use of missionary training institutions, and has been adopted by the Chicago M. E. Missionary Training School and others.

Through its medical temperance department, led by Mrs. Allen, the W. C. T. U. is enlisting the aid of nurses' associations in the educational work among women in the homes; for nurses can do much to warn women of the danger of nostrums, and of the family prescription of alcoholic and other powerful and habit-producing drugs. The Nurses' Associated Alumnæ of the United States and the Society of Superintendents of Nurses' Training Schools in annual session at St. Paul and Minneapolis, last summer, unanimously adopted the W. C. T. U. resolution:

"Inasmuch as the poverty, misery and crime, resulting from the use of alcohol and other narcotic drugs, are an aftermath of their action as physical poisons, and they are scientifically proved to be a directly contributory cause of many diseases, as tuberculosis, Bright's disease, and, above all, the Black Plague, we, as women, as nurses, as health teachers, and as humanitarians,

"Resolve, That we will do all we can, with professional propriety, to teach their nature and effect, and discourage their use."

During the six months of the exposition the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has a representative exhibit and rest-room at Seattle, in the Manufactures Building. An exhibit was also made at the biennial convention of the Christian Endeavor Society in St. Paul, and schools of methods have been held in the various Chautauquas.

THE PEARL OF PEARLS

Sermon by Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D.

I'll give myself to Jesus to-night." Shall you have any jewels in your crown?

Pearls shine as brightly after they have been worn a thousand years as when they first emerged from the mother cell. So they that turn many to righteousness shall shine like the stars, forever and ever.

No thought, no word, no act of yours will ever die. Your influence will never cease, and its growth will never stop. The influence which you start in life to-day, in the family, the church, the neighborhood, or the social circle, is perhaps very small now, very little cared for now, but it will roll forward through the ages, growing wider and stronger, and deeper and higher with every passing hour, and blighting or blessing as it rolls.

The pearl also represents the hazards and sacrifices at which salvation was obtained. The diamond and the ruby, the emerald and the sapphire, lie bedded in river courses, or are set in the solid rocks, and there men seek them without the loss of health or risk of life. But pearls belong to the ocean; they are gems which she casts not among the pebbles that strew her beach, but hides in dangerous and darkest depths. A dreadful trade is the pearl-fisher's. And the stories of the dangers which pearl-fishers have always to encounter, and the dreadful death they have often to endure, should recall to our minds the fact that we ought to be ashamed of the spasmodic efforts we put forth to win souls, and our talk of the hardship and difficulties of our service becomes positively trifling when we think of the dangers and discomforts men have to endure in the search for earth's gems. For pearls men will endure the attacks of sharks and sawfish, and shorten their lives by the excessive strain of frequent diving, and shall it be said that we are less in earnest to save men? What are pearls compared with souls?

Oh for quenchless love, glowing enthusiasm and fiery zeal! Enthusiasm gives a man irresistible power. What power Christians would be in the world if each one could honestly voice this wish of Brainerd: "Oh that I were a flaming fire in the hands of my God!" The seraphic Summerfield, just before his death, speaking of his recovery, said: "Oh, if I might be raised again, how I would preach! I have taken a look into eternity." Oh for the spirit of John Knox, who cried: "O God, give me Scotland or I die." Do you find lukewarmness in the hall of legislature? What zeal is exhibited there by the champions of one measure against the defenders of another! What earnestness in speaking! What enthusiasm in applause! Or turn to the Exchange. Any lukewarmness there? What anxious faces! What throbbing hearts! What agitation about some speculation which may end in the ruin or issue in the new and great prosperity of him who has begun it! Look to the streets, the stations of the railways, anywhere if man be there. Do we find anything but enthusiasm where he believes his safety or his interests are involved?

Is it not the fact, the strange and inexplicable fact, that men who will applaud enthusiasm in the business man, excitement in the Senator, are yet the admirers in Christianity of indifference alike in the pulpit and in the pew?

It is only scepticism that suffers enthusiasm in the things of Cæsar, and will not endure enthusiasm in the weightier and more important things of God. Look where you will, consult any analogy, and see that indifference and apathy are chargeable alike with guilt and inconsistency in the sight of God. We profess to believe that the world of sinners outside of Christ are to be eternally lost unless turned from their evil ways, and yet we so live as to give the lie to such a profession, or else stamp ourselves as without the commonest feeling of humanity. The man who does not make his religion the business of his life may disguise it as he likes; he does not believe, or he believes in Christ as he believes in Washington, or in some cold dead fact of history, which belongs to another age, and has no living connection with him or bearing on his destiny.

Oh, I wonder that the truth of the Gospel does not electrify mankind! It is the awful evidence that a terrible disease has fallen upon us that we can see all the love that welcomed the tempest for poor lost man, and sit insensate as icicles. The pearl of great price! Our redemption! Oh, what it cost Jesus! Agonies which no mortal tongue has ever told rent and tore his holy heart upon the accursed tree; and all this agony, the agony of eternity and of infinitude compressed into moments, for me! for me!
